lieve against the hardship I have been discussing. This is it, in a circular issued five days ago:

To prevent the fraud now practiced in the acquisition of public lands of the United States, I have to direct that hereafter no final certificate, patent, or other evidence of title shall be issued under the public-land laws until an actual examination has been made on the ground by an authorized officer of the Government; but the following shall be excepted from the force of this order:

(1) All claims which have heretofore been examined on the ground by an authorized officer of the Government whose report is found satisfactory.

That provision does not mean anything. That class of cases was not covered by it. It was not necessary to recite it as an exception; it was excepted.

Second—and this is the one to which I direct attention:

(2) All claims where heretofore an officer of the Government other than officers authorized to take final proof shall have been present at the taking of final proof to cross-examine claimant and witnesses, if such proof is found satisfactory.

See the effect of that. The effect of that is to declare that the act of the register and receiver of the United States land offices in taking proof is to count for nothing whatever unless some special agent of the Government has been present other than those men whom we designated as the officers upon whose judgment the patent should issue. The men whom Congress designated as the medium through which the Government's bounty should pass are set aside, and this order provides that their action shall count for nothing unless it was performed in the presence of another officer appointed by the Interior Department by a rule and regulation.

Further than that, this is one that was supposed to exempt mining claims from the effect of the order.

(3) All claims where claimant's compliance with law has been established by contest or other regular adverse proceedings.

When an application for a patent for a mining claim is made and any other person desires to claim it or contest it a suit is commenced in the courts and it is determined by a final judg-They concede by this modification of the ment and decree. order that they would be bound by that decree. They probably would be bound by it, whether they said so by this order or not. The party's rights probably would be established by the decree of the court whether this executive branch of the Government thought so or not, and the party would probably be protected in those rights whether the executive branch of the Government approved it or not. So that provision was unnecessary.

(5) Selections and entries in which no residence

Now, this is the one that it was said, no residence being required upon a mining claim, this cured that; but they unfortunately added these words-or improvements

The act of Congress provides that upon every mining claim there shall be expended in labor and in improvements during each year not less than the value of $100. The word "value" is used. They must expend not less than $100 in labor and improvements upon the claim during each year. That does not improvements upon the claim during each year. That does not exempt mining claims, because the title to mining claims depends upon the continuous expenditure for improvements until they are patented or entered for patent. So you see that mining claims are not relieved of the burden of the message of December 17, nor of the burden of the first clause of the message of January 25.

EVIL OF OUR METHOD OF LEGISLATION.

What I said yesterday applies as well to mining claims as to the homesteads. I suggested the evil of our method of legislation in which not at the end but before we reach the end of an enactment we say "subject to such rules and regulations as may be made" by this or that Department. We are authorized, we are empowered, and we are capable of making every necessary provision not only for the enactment of a law fixing rights, but for the enforcement of the law. More evil, more injustice, more fraud, have grown out of the provision which we attach to our half-expressed laws "subject to the rules and regulations of the Department" than have ever grown out of any law enacted by Congress.

We enacted a little section of a statute of about twelve lines with reference to rights of way across the public domain, the act of March 1, 1905, and we added to it "under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, and subject to the laws of the State or Territory in which such reserves are respectively situated." Only a little more than a year has elapsed.

The rules and regulations for the enforcement of that statute all the merit of which they squeezed out of it that there was in it, which have made the rights that were intended to be con-ferred under it so insignificant and difficult to take advantage of that it is absolutely useless, cover the balance of this pamphlet. [Exhibiting.]

We passed a statute with reference to the right of way for canals, ditches, and reservoirs, which can be written upon one page of a pamphlet, and the rules and regulations made under that liberal provision, which take the place of what Congress should have done itself, cover 38 pages of a pamphlet of rules and regulations. So while we profess to be legislating upon these important questions, the fact is we are delegating our power to legislate to a branch of the Government that has no power to legislate.

Not only have we delegated the power to legislate to that Department of the Government, through this phrase that we use so readily and which should never be used, for which there is no real occasion, but we have delegated, or at least we have acquiesced in the assumption of the judicial power of the Government by this Department.

In ten years they have sat in final judgment in the Interior Department upon 3,032 contests involving the title to public lands of the United States. They are decided by the clerks of the Department. The decisions are written up by the clerks of They are submitted to the heads of the Dethe Department. partments, and I undertake to say that in practically all instances, except perhaps where attention of the head of the Department is called in a special case to some obvious error, those opinions written up by the clerks are adopted and filed as the final determination of the rights of property, and they are final, because there is no appeal from the decision of the Secretary of the Interior to any judicial tribunal under existing law.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. FLINT. I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho if he knows the amount involved in litigation pending before the Interior Department?

Mr. HEYBURN. I know the amount involved in many cases. I know the amount involved in one case which occurs to my mind that is conservatively stated to be not less than $5,000,000. I know of another case the decision of which is reviewed in a newspaper clipping which I took from the paper this morning, in which they reverse the local land office, that involves, according to a conservative estimate, not less than $18,000,000. I do not know who wrote the decision in that case. I have a very strong suspicion as to who wrote it. I think I know; and I know that this Senate would besitate a long while before it would confirm that gentleman if his nomination were sent to this body for confirmation as a judge of any class. This message complains in the following language:

I am gravely concerned at the extremely unsatisfactory condition of the public land laws.

I said yesterday that I was more gravely concerned at the unsatisfactory condition of the execution of the laws; and if I have failed to point out the grounds upon which that concern rests, then I have spoken to little purpose.

The law complained of is the one that gave to the homesteaders of Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska, the Dakotas, Montana, Colorado, Utah, Wyoming, Idaho, Washington, and California the land titles upon which their great wealth rests, which gave the settlement, the homes, that constitute the civilization of that great section of the country; and it remains for this day and this hour to demonstrate that those laws are evil in their effect and dangerous in this execution, and to bring to us a recommendation in the annual report of the Secretary of the Interior recommending that these land laws be repealed or modified. If five generations of American statesmen and executive officers have found it possible to guard the public interests under these laws, if five generations have found it possible to so execute them as to preserve the rights of the individual and the integrity of the Government, does it not raise an inquiry in the mind as to whether this statement that the laws are so defective as to result in fraud against the Government and the destruction of the rights of the people is justified? Does it not put us upon inquiry as to whether we have been perhaps slowly drifting away from the true spirit that should govern the enforcement of the law and make it adequate to the necessities of the Government and of its citizens?

Mr. President, it is impossible to discuss a question of this kind effectively unless we forget or waive for the moment any consideration of the effect of the procedure upon the minds of those whose acts we are discussing. That is as mild as I can put I have not the slightest doubt that the President of the United States is perfectly honest and sincere, and intends to do no man a wrong in making the Executive order set forth in this message. I am equally certain that the sources of information from which he draws his conclusion are subject to the severest criticism and open to the censure of the controlling body in this Government, which is the legislative body.

As was said this morning, the very first prime principle laid down by those who made the Constitution was that the Government should be composed of three coordinate branches, and that the legislative branch represents the people. It is through that branch that the people speak their wish as to the law, its form and character, that they would live under and be governed by.

The executive branch is the hand of Congress that applies the law, that executes it, that executes the will of the people, not according to his will, but as expressed through Congress. Congress is the will of the people, and it rests nowhere else. think, perhaps, some mistaken sentiment arises from the fact that the people are apt to give credit to that function which comes closest to them in granting the things they like, even though the provision for the grant, the spirit from which it arose, the real controlling factor, may be in the background.

Mr. President, I would not abate one line or tittle of the President's power or prerogative. There is no man in this body who has a higher regard for that office than I, who has given it more serious and respectful consideration than I; and as it is true of the office in my case, it is true of the man who occupies it.

I do not believe that he ever issued an order that was not as it should be, voluntarily or knowingly. As he would be sub-ject in his final executive act, which consists of placing his name upon the muniment of title which passes the public landand he would be dependent upon the report of the special agent sent into the mountains to determine the fact-so would be be misguided should that agent err. The President would not be to blame were he to refuse to act or were he to act upon the information of this special agent whom he had sent to inquire.

I trust and I believe that Congress will not put it within the power of the President or of any branch of the Government, except Congress itself, to send an agent out to determine the rights of individuals in contravention of the rules that we have established or that we may establish; and when we say that certain things shall constitute proof sufficient upon which to base a grant from the Government, let it stand that way, and give no executive officer of the Government the right to question that proof. If parties violate the law or impose upon it, we have provided, and shall continue to provide, penal statutes that will hold them liable and punish them. That is sufficient. It is sufficient as to other property, and why is it not sufficient as to the public lands of the United States?

What we want is not to keep these public lands. The spirit of this message is that we want to hold on to them and keep them. It is the policy and it is to the interest of the Government to get rid of those public lands as fast as possible, because it is simply exchanging lands for men, families, citizenship, and

I want to see this Congress take away from this executive branch of the Government the power to sit in judgment upon the performance of our duty; to sit in judgment upon the rights of parties who have complied with the provisions of the statute of Congress.

LAND COURTS THE REMEDY.

I have introduced into this Congress, and there is now on the table, a measure that I desire to call the attention of the Senate to at this time. I have delayed calling it up until this occasion. It is perfectly germane to the consideration of this question, and after the discussion of this resolution is finished I shall then ask that it go to the proper committee. Senate bill 6647 is a bill which I introduced at the beginning of this session, which provides for the establishment of a land court that shall consider and determine all controversies as to rights to the public lands of the United States, whether those controversies are between individuals or between the individual and the Government of the United States. This measure proposes to establish in each public-land State having more than 2,000,000 acres of public land a land court, over which there shall preside a single judge, to be appointed as other United States judges are appointed, with the qualifications of a United States district judge. It would mean the appointment of fifteen judges over these land courts. They would sit twice a year in each land district and hear all controverted cases. They would, under the provisions of this bill, each receive a salary of $5,000 a year. Each court would be provided with a clerk to perform the usual Each court would be provided with a cierk to perform the usual functions of a cierk. I am going to ask this Congress, and succeeding Congresses, if it be necessary, to enact this legislation as a substitute for these quasi-judicial tribunals that are presided over by cierks of the Department. I am going to do it on the ground of securing justice to the contestants and on the ground of economy in the administration of the law.

There would be fifteen judges with a salary of $5,000 a year each, which would require an expenditure of $75,000 a year.

There would be fifteen clerks with a salary of $2,500 each, which would require the expenditure of $37,500.

Then I would provide for a supreme land court, to sit either at Washington or at some centrally located place like the city of Denver, which should consist of three supreme judges. give them a salary of $7,500 a year each, because their duties are of the highest order, and it would be important to secure men of first-class ability for those positions. That makes an aggregate of $135,000 a year as the cost of maintaining these courts, because the other costs would be paid by the fees as in Such courts would sit right at the land office, or other courts. convenient to it, and instead of having hearings, as they have them now, up two flights of stairs, perhaps, or in some back room where half of the people interested can never get into the stuffy little room, arguing questions of law and legal rights before a layman who has never studied law, as they do now, we would have these courts presided over by lawyers of ability, approved by this body after their appointment, at a cost not exceeding $135,000 a year for all of them.

We are asked here for $700,000 for special agents. you who have charge of the appropriation bills will find that the aggregate of items that are passed in these bills at your hands are for doing what? Not for deciding these cases, but for hunting up testimony and visiting the claims, to determine whether or not the land officers of the United States are performing their duty or have been guilty of a neglect of it or of a criminal violation of it. The cost of these special agents alone would pay the cost of the courts three times over, and you would cut down the force now engaged in the inadequate performance of this duty in the Department; you would cut down the force of laymen exercising judicial functions, whose salaries alone would amount to more than the cost of maintaining these courts.

ADEQUATE SERVICE IN LIEU OF AN INADEQUATE ONE.

You would get results from the bill which I have introduced and which I shall ask go to the Committee on the Judiciary when I have discussed it and when other Senators have discussed it, if they shall see fit to do so, substituting these courts of law and equity for these quasi-judicial tribunals. You will relieve the Government of hundreds of thousands of dollars of expense and give an adequate service in lieu of an inadequate one. The executive department has stated in this message, and the Secretary of the Interior says in his report to Congress, that they can not enforce existing law; that they can not purge it of impositions and violations. They confess it. Well, we will accept the confession, and we will try the other coordinate branch of the Government that has never failed us in administering justice between man and man and between the citizen and all the citizens.

That is where the matter ought to have been placed originally. Forty thousand cases have been decided through this imperfect medium which I have been considering-right sometimes. I would not undertake the duty of sifting the right from the wrong, but to those who are capable of sitting in this body as members of it no argument is needed to show that these questions should be determined by judicial tribunals and not by executive officers.

There has been a decision rendered involving the act of Congress, published yesterday, which I clipped from the morning paper to which I have referred, involving land which both parties confess is worth more than $20,000,000-a decision of that kind never submitted to the judicial scrutiny of a judicial tribunal, though it affects the rights of a vast number of peo--a contest with the Northern Pacific Railway Company as pleto whether it or the settlers and the miners are entitled to that land.

Mr. President, the reason of this bill providing for the courts under the division of the States is that upon investigation it will appear that no State has so many land offices, nor are the land offices in any State so situated that this law would not be readily and conveniently applicable and so that the judge might hold the necessary terms in each land district, nor would the delay at any time exceed six months, because the judge would be there twice a year.

I know to-day, and so does every other person within hearing know, that in the Interior Department there are cases that have been tied up four or five years; that they carry over from year to year hundreds and hundreds of cases that are waiting the report of the special agent. I will not take time to read the details, which I have here in the Commissioner's report, but a number of cases have been tied up there for long periods of time, some of them awaiting the report of the special examiner and some of them awaiting the examination of the report of the special examiner, and then all are tied up by this Executive Talk about speedy relief in the determination of men's rights to property! I can imagine no more cumbersome, unsatisfactory, or tardy administration of our laws.

I have provided in this bill that, whenever a controversy arises, whether it be at the instigation of an officer of the United States or between individuals, the court shall take jurisdiction upon the filing of a certified copy of the record in the court. When that record is filed, the clerk dockets it, and the case is at issue upon the condition of facts that were stated in the Land Office, because the court is simply substituted to determine the condition that arose in the Land Office. If no controversy arises, then our statutes are sufficient to prevent the miscarriage of justice.

The bill provides further that an appeal shall lie from these judges, one in each land State, to the supreme land court, the appellate land court, and that their judgment can only be reviewed on questions of law by the Supreme Court of the United States. The facts may be further determined at the trial in the land court, because of the inconvenience of presenting facts fully in the Land Office, preliminary to the jurisdiction changing from the Land Office to the court, and that the record of the land court shall be the record in the appellate court, and the appellate court may consider the case upon the whole record, and the United States Supreme Court will only review the law.

There is a complete system, a complete tribunal, as a substitute on the appeal of these departments that they can not enforce the law. They can not. They have not the material to do it with. They ought never to have been charged with the duty, and it is high time they were relieved of it.

EXPENSE OF NECESSARY NUMBER OF INSPECTORS.

If we were to start with a force of inspectors to-day to investigate the 52,000 entries that are tied up by this Executive order, allowing one man to investigate ten cases in a month—which, of course, he could not do—it would take more years than any Senator has to serve in this body to dispose of the cases that would be before the Land Office on the 1st day of next January, because they come in there at the rate on an average of 104,000 a year, and if Congress does not—and it will not—provide for these inspectors at this session, where will they be in twelve months? They will have no inspectors; there will have been no patent issued; the wheels of justice will have stood still; and, instead of having pending 52,000 cases as we have now, there will be 152,000. If we were to make the appropriation on the first day of the next Congress, we might start out about 3,000 inspectors—and 3,000 inspectors would mean an expense of $3,600,000 a year at the pay that inspectors are now receiving—and we would have that force in the field regularly and permanently, because with 154,000 cases to begin with and 100,000 coming in every year, it would mean a permanent force of inspectors. The figures are too large for consideration.

The remedy is obvious. Transfer it to a department of the Government that has never confessed that it could not perform its duty; and that is to the judiciary department of the Government. Let us try it, and let us reply to this message by saying we will relieve this department of the Government that has sent to us its cry for mercy from the consideration of these questions wherein it is necessary to determine the right of the individual to the public domain. That is the answer to be sent to that message by the enactment of the bill that I introduced or some similar measure that will transfer this difficult question.

Mr. President, I do not intend to make my remarks more extended than would seem necessary. There are some general features of this message other than those that I have discussed that need a brief consideration. In the first place, the President complains of the fraud that results from the desert-land act. I think the desert-land act ought to be amended. I have never been in entire sympathy with the desert-land law. I think Congress did wisely when it reduced the area that might be taken up under that act by one-half. Now, I think if Congress will amend that act by excusing the party from residence at all for the first year, or even for the first two years, and after that require residence upon the land for two years, they will probably take it out of the way of temptation in the avenues of fraud.

As was explained by the Senator from Montana [Mr. Carter] yesterday, the law now requires quite a large expenditure upon this class of lands before title can be obtained. As evidence that it is not such a tempting avenue of fraud as you might be led to believe by the newspapers, the very small number of claims that have been taken under it during the existence of the law is conclusive proof. But I think that law can be amended.

It is not claimed seriously by anyone that there has been any very great amount of fraud perpetrated under it. I do not know any single conviction of fraud under the desert-land law.

The Senator from Montana indicates that I am correct in that conclusion. If there has not been a single conviction or a single charge of fraud sustained under a law that has been in existence as long as the desert-land law, what grounds are there for this plea that it be repealed?

Let us in this body and in the other branch of Congress give these questions such attention as they deserve. They are worthy of consideration. Let us give them consideration in committee and in the body in Committee of the Whole, because we can never succeed unless Senators will take a general interest in the consideration of these questions. We can not succeed solely through the action of committees. Able and conscientious and industrious as is the Committee on Public Lands and as is the Committee on the Judiciary, capable as they are of performing their duty, yet we must not forget that every Senator is a member of the greatest committee of this body, and that is the Committee of the Whole.

If that committee does not consider these questions, but relies solely upon the work of the standing committees, then it must follow, because of the pressure of business and the large number of great questions before them, that important legislation will be passed by. So I commend the study of the desert-land law to every member of the Senate, in committee and out. It is not a sufficient foundation upon which to base the complaint that comes to us in this message.

LAND LAWS SHOULD BE MODIFIED.

The commutation clause of the homestead law has never met with my approval when I was in private life nor since I have been in public life. I think the time is too short during which a man is required to live upon his homestead. I would not require him to live upon the homestead continuously during the first year at all. It is impracticable, because the land is unbroken; it is wild land; and the man is not to be presumed to have an accumulation of wealth that will enable him to pay out for the necessities that he can not raise on the soil. allowance should be and should have been made for that. soil of Kansas and Iowa is different from the soil in the States farther west. In 1869 I saw a man planting corn in Kansas with an ax, and he raised a sufficient crop there on which to feed his stock that fall. He was driving an ax into the soil, dropping the corn, stamping his foot on it, and going along, and I wondered at it; but a little later I saw that he knew what he was doing. He had a crop of corn; not a very good crop, but sufficient. But farther west there is no condition like that at all applicable or possible.

So I think that the homesteader should not be required to live on his homestead continuously during the first year. During the second year, after he has raised one crop, if the land is fit for homestead at all, I think he should be compelled to reside on it. He should be compelled to reside on it the third year; and at the end of the fourth year he should be prosperous if the land is at all adapted to home making. Then at the end of the fourth year, if he has been faithful and has resided there and wants to commute, I would allow him to do it—to pay off—that is, to buy his last year of service.

It is not necessary because some one has violated the law to repeal it. It is not necessary that the merchant, because some person steals a hat from his counter, should close up his store, Let the homestead law be taken up for serious and conservative consideration and action; but do not let us repeal it. Let us extend it rather than repeal it.

Then, Mr. President, the next suggestion is as to the stone and timber acts. I am going to allow that question to rest where the Senator from Montana [Mr. Carter] left it. He dealt with it so thoroughly that it does not seem to me necessary to do more than make a suggestion about it.

STONE AND TIMBER LAW.

I think the stone and timber act in its original purpose and intent was all right. I think the area which could be taken up under its provisions was too large. I think the lands to which it is applicable should be an adjunct to those lands that have no timber on them, and they are considered so to be in the section of country where I live. The law is generally applied in that way. The men who have those rolling wheat fields in what we call the "Palouse country" will have a timber claim of 40 or 60 acres, or up to the limit of the law, in the forests that lie on the mountain sides within sight of their doors. They draw their fuel, their building material, their fencing material from that little tract of forest land; and it is sufficient, with the natural growth and accumulation, for all their purposes, present and future. I would favor an amendment of the stone and timber law. I would not allow a fraud to be perpetrated under it; and there is not a court that can not protect the Government against a fraud when it is charged. [Applause in the galleries.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair must inform the occupants of the galleries that applause is not allowed by the rules of the Senate

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, Mr. President, I come to a question that is wider in its scope than this message—
Mr. NEWLANDS, Mr. President—
The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. Mr. NEWLANDS. Do I understand that the Senator from Idaho approves of the stone and timber act as it now stands?

Mr. HEYBURN. I would amend it. I would reduce the area that may be taken up under it. I would make that area an adjunct to the homestead, or where I allowed land to be located under it for commercial purposes, as it must be, I would pass the title of the land to the locator and retain a stumpage to the Government.

That suggests an idea. Under existing laws, the assumption is that every man—the Senator from Nevada as well as myself-will go into the forest and cut his own wood. quate provision is made for commercial dealing in wood. Take our city of Wallace. The forest reserve comes down to our back doors. The mountains are covered with a splendid growth of wood, some ripe and some growing, in every condition in which forests are found. There is never to be a condition of the country of the co which forests are found. There is enough ripe and overripe wood to afford an ample supply without deterioration of the forest, but if we want fuel we go to a wood yard and buy it. A few months afterwards we have a call from a Government agent asking us to pay again for the wood that we bought and paid the dealer for. I know a large number of cases in my own city in which that was done; and rather than have a contest rather than be brought into court charged with a crime—the purchaser settled again; and instead of paying the price the wood was worth that he had paid to the dealer, he would pay it over again to the Government. I know innumerable instances of that kind. They are matters of record.

How are you going to provide for the commercial product of wood to be dealt out by the dealers or through the wood yards to the city? How is the man engaged in business, the lawyer, the physician, the merchant, to get his wood? Under the present laws he must make an application to the forester; it must be approved; then he goes into the woods, where trees are se-lected and marked, and then he is allowed to cut it and get it home. It needs no argument to demonstrate the absurdity of such a law. Those are rules and regulations. Congress never passed any law that contemplated any such interpretation. The conditions that surround a permit to cut wood for commercial purposes to be sold in the public markets of a city or elsewhere are so onerous that nobody, comparatively speaking, will apply for the privilege of cutting wood at all.

Wood yards that existed for years in our city and that were a reliable source of supply have closed up. Their owners say they will not put themselves in the position of walking so close to a line that an agent stands there to see whether or not in felling the tree that was marked for them they skin another tree. They say that they can find occupations that are more comfortable and equally profitable. The result is that the price of wood, since the forest reserve was created which bounds the city in which I live, has advanced 75 per cent.

The result is that since the Government has anticipated the legislation of Congress and taken possession of the timber lands of the country, the price of lumber in our country has, with every proclamation creating a timber reserve, advanced from two to five dollars a thousand. Why? Because there is a limited supply of timber, and those who already have large holdings are in the mastery. If all the timber land that is not already held in private ownership is withdrawn from the market, it gives those who have the holdings a monopoly. They have not only the inclination but the power to create a trust, a monopoly, because of which the people pay so much per thousand and so much per cord.

The proposal to lease these lands by the Government, that the Government shall be the proprietor of a great business enterprise, that the Government shall stand behind the counter and compete with individuals in the business field, the field of trade, PROPOSAL TO LOAN THE FORESTRY SERVICE $5,000,000 PREPOSTEROUS.

Under our system of government the Government was to be the agency of the people and not the master, and yet it is now proposed and Congress is asked to loan the Forestry Service $5,000,000. The President asks it in this message. President recommends that we loan the Forestry Service $5,-000,000, sufficient to provide a reasonable working capital for the national forests. That is the way men go into business. They have or they borrow a capital as a business reserve to enable them to conduct the business. These officials will be asking us next, perhaps, to loan them out of the Treasury of asking us lext, perhaps, to loan them out of the Treasury of the United States another $5,000,000 in order that they can take control of the fisheries on the coast, and another $5,000,000 in order that they may take control of the coal lands of the country or lease them. If they need to borrow of us $5,000,000 in order to start up the lumber business, how much will we be called upon to lend them to start up the mining of coal? I do called upon to lend them to start up the mining of coal? I do not know what it costs to start up a great coal enterprise in the State of Pennsylvania, or Wyoming, or Montana, or Washington, but I imagine if we take this request in the President's message as the criterion they will be calling upon Congress to loan the coal department $20,000,000, in order that it may put in breakers, develop mines, build a counter, and get behind and sell to the people the products that belong to the people.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President—

Mr. President-The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Washington? Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

HARDSHIP IMPOSED ON THE SETTLERS.

Mr. PILES. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Idaho to another hardship imposed on the settlers in the western country by reason of the policy he is discussing. I know of my own personal knowledge of a case which I had occasion to defend some years ago in the Federal court, where one of the special agents, traveling around through the country, had gone to the place of a farmer who had taken up a homestead in the forest. There was a little mill located in the vicinity, and the farmer had sold some of the magnificent fir trees which are produced in that country in order to get them off his place so that he could clear up his land. This man had taken his wife and his children out into the forest and had lived there for many years, engaged in cultivating and improving the property. Yet for purchasing the timber that was taken from that land, which it was necessary to remove from the land in order that the farmer might make a living, the person who thus aided the settler to carry on his business was brought into the Federal court and prosecuted for buying timber off the public land. is not necessary for me to say that when that case was properly presented to the court the court found that the timber was properly taken from the land, and there was no verdict in behalf of the Government in that regard.

I merely cite this instance for the purpose of showing the great disadvantages to which the settlers on the western lands are put. Cases of this character prevent the farmers from dis-posing of their timber at anything like a fair price, because the mill companies, understanding that they are liable to be prosecuted by the Federal Government in cases of the character I have mentioned, purchase the timber from the settler at their own price. I think along the line the Senator is discussing we ought to do something to protect the people in the western country.

DECISION OF COURT DISREGARDED.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes, Mr. President, and this is the way the Department looks upon the courts for protecting the people. have here an official communication, a copy of which I called signed by the Acting Forester, animadverting upon the decision of a court. I will read into the RECORD so much of it as applies. He says:

Your attention is specially called to the fact that although several United States district courts followed the decision of Judge Weilborn in the case of the United States v. Lee Blasingame (116 Fed., 654), holding the act of June 4, 1897 (30 Stat., 34-36), unconstitutional—higher courts have subsequently decided to the contrary. The attorney-general, believing the decision of Judge Wellborn to be erroneous, suggested to the Secretary of the Interior that it be not regarded as a final determination of the question, and that prosecutions be proceeded with in other districts, so that, if possible, a case could be taken to an appellate court for determination. This hope was finally realized in the case of Dent v. The United States (76 Pac. Rep., 455) on appeal before the supreme court of Arizona.

Consider that for a moment, lawyers of this body. Because the United States court held that under the law of Congress a party was not liable for the act that was displeasing to the executive department of the Government, they instructed the officer to disregard the opinion of the court, which was final, and seek for some tribunal in which they could obtain a decision according to their will and not according to the law. method which deserves serious consideration in this body. found it in a little lone decision in the supreme court of Arizona, and they have been rejoicing and boasting in the press and elsewhere that they had a decision which would sustain them in their unlawful act, notwithstanding the fact that not only Judge Wellborn but Judge Whitson, in the State of Washington, and other Federal judges have held that the conclusion arrived at by the supreme court of Arizona is not the law. That is the way they treated it.

There is another feature of the case, suggested by the Senator from Washington [Mr. Piles], speaking of the homesteader. I wish to call attention here to the instructions issued under date of November 17, 1904, by the Commissioner of the General Land Office to forest officers, as to the manner in which they should treat the homesteaders. I read a portion of it:

Locators of unperfected homestead claims, proposing to leave the reserve and reside elsewhere, may desire to remove the improvements therefrom.

This is interesting.

There is no objection to the removal of improvements from any class of lands above mentioned, provided they can be removed without detriment to the forest reserve; and provided that they can serve no useful purpose to the Government for the accommodation of its forest officers in the administration of forest-reserve affairs.

In other words, the Commissioner of the General Land Office instructs his subordinates that they may take possession of the homestead buildings of the settler upon the public downing the homestead buildings of the settler upon the public downing the homestead provided the found to be within a forest have in mind a case within the Pend d'Oreille section where a man had been living for eighteen months and had constructed a building as substantial as any farm building in the country surrounding here, not knowing that he was within a reserve or liable to be, anticipating long residence along the Pend Oreille River, laying the foundation for a home. He woke up one morning to see in the paper that he was within a forest reserve and that the thirty days had expired in which he might take certain steps. The officers took possession of his building, and they have possession, and he had to leave and That is along the lines of this order. large number of them here. I do not intend to make a forestreserve speech in discussing this question except so far as it is referred to in the message of the President of the United States. The question has come in here through this message, and it must be met.

The system of forest reserves as established is so vicious, is so unfair, as to encounter the antagonism of every American citizen who ever dreams of taking advantage of his rights to share in the public domain and its benefits. What do Senators think of it when the State of Idaho-I use this merely as an example; some other States are as bad-can be seized by an irresponsible subordinate of the Government as a plaything, treated as though it were his own private estate to the extent as shown upon this map [exhibiting]. The black portion on this map of the State of Idaho represents forest reserves 18,000,000 acres and more in forest reserves withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the State, withdrawn from the civil jurisdiction of the state; the laws that you passed before we were admitted as a State and when we were admitted as a State, the rights you gave us when we were admitted as a State, taken away from us at the will and pleasure of this bureau of the Government; noncontributive to the Government either through the means of taxation or through the accretion of wealth which comes from settlement and civilization. have taken more than forty of our public schools within the forest reserves. They have taken many churches. They have taken more than forty post-offices within the forest reserves, and the law of the State of Idaho stops at the border of those reserves. I know that it will be contended otherwise, but I know the effect of it.

The judge of the court of the second judicial district of Idaho told me recently that it cost more than $8,000 at one term of his court to try men for crimes committed upon the Bitter Root Forest Reserve in Idaho. We have to stand the responsibility and the expense of administering the law where murders are committed and offenses of that kind are committed, but the rights of the citizen under the law stop at the line. He may not drive his stock across the reserve without a permit that must come to Washington for approval. must come to Washington for approval. They have surrounded tracts of land with forest reserves and then they pass a rule and regulation, by the grace of Congress, which says, "If you want to drive stock from your farm," which they have surrounded with a reserve, "you must apply to the Forester for a That application is sent to Washington to be conpermit." That application is sent to Washington to be considered, and if it is found satisfactory, they will grant you a permit. But you must give a bond. You must tell what stock you are going to take. You must tell how long you are going to keep them on your farm. You must tell when you want to take them out from there; and those are not half of the restrictions about it. They will come and deliberately surround you with one of these beautiful estates—this waste of idleness and silence and unprofitableness—this game reserve.

Forest-reserve agents actually met or approunced a meeting to be held for the purpose of considering the propriety of recommending to Congress the creation of a great game preserve, that was to be larger than the State of Connecticut. I happened to get some word of it, and to heap some ridicule upon it, and if they met, they did it surreptitiously, and I could not find that they did. These officials want us to appropriate money enough they did. These officials want us to appropriate money chough to employ this class of inspectors, they call them, and experts— experts on trees, experts on mines, experts on grazing, experts on land, experts on the judgment of the American citizen who desires to select a home. They want us to give them money to employ these experts in order that they may check the judgment of the man who is willing to cast his lot and take his family with him and attempt to live upon the public domain of the nited States.

THEY HAVE TAKEN POSSESSION OF THE PUBLIC PASTURES OF THE STATE. Not only that, but they have taken possession of the public pastures of the State, and when a man wants to pasture sheep or cattle or horses upon the public domain in Idaho he must make an application in form, and after a great deal of routine get a permit from the Forester. He must give the number and the character and a description of the stock he wants to graze, and then on a certain day the Forester apportions it, and if, after the day when the lands of Idaho are apportioned, any other man wants to go into the stock business, he is barred, because there is a limit to the land and there is no longer any land to be apportioned. So there is no margin for the growth of the stock industry.

We formerly pastured upon the land in Idaho that is now confined to a certain number twice the number that the Government allows. What do they save it for? It endured the experience of herdsmen for a century. It kept the buffalo and the wild animals since "the morning stars sang together," and we came along there and had just as high regard for the preservation of those pasture lands as the people of the East, from whose midst we came. We are as patriotic, we care as much for the rights of the Government as any men from any other section of the country. We have as small a percentage of men who would be guilty of a dishonorable act as any other section of the country. We yield to no part of the people in the sufficiency or character of our patriotism, and yet we are being made the plaything of caprice, of theories—for what? Is it to make place for men, or is it the greed for power and domination?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President—

to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. HEYBURN. I will yield in a moment. I wish to finish my expression. Is it on the theory of the man who came to this country from fields of labor on the other side of the ocean, and who wrote home to his brother, "I have been in the country only three weeks, and I am boss of five men?" Probably that is the spirit. I do not know. I can not account for it. It never occurred before in the history of this country that such wholesale devastation should be wrought merely at the whim and fancy of any man or pursuant to any man's theories.

I now yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. CARTER. I do not know what the motive may be, but referring again to a subject to which I made brief reference yesterday, I know what the effect is. I wish to read briefly from the report of the board of trade of the city of Calgary, under the beading "The American in Canada."

The present "trek" of American in Canada.

The present "trek" of Americans from every State of the Union into the Canadian West is a history-making movement. The Britisher, who is undecided whether to emigrate to the States or to Canada, stands aghast when he is shown the following statistics of American immigration into Alberta and other portions of western Canada:

1898	9, 119
1899	11.945
1899	11, 030
1900	15, 570

1901	17.958
1902	91 679
1902	-1,014
1903	47 780
AUVO	74, 100
1904	43 173
AVV T	2 479 2 2 4 4 5
	2001.000

I am told that during the year 1906 more than 150,000 men left our western country to go into the Dominion of Canada to settle upon land there. I think this is one of the legitimate results of the policy to which the Senator is referring.

The report continues:

He is now wisely deciding to go with the crowd. At the National Irrigation Congress, at Portland, Oreg., in 1905, it was stated:

"The bone and sinew of the Mississippi Valley have been moving into western Canada for the past four years to find farms and fortunes."

The remarkable thing about this movement, however, is not the grand total, but the steadily increasing volume of immigration. The annual movement from the United States has increased practically a thousandfold in the past nine years.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President-

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. May I make an inquiry of the Senator from Montana, and that is whether the settlers who go to Canada settle upon arid lands or in a humid country?

Mr. CARTER. The lands are generally arid lands. the eastern slope of the Rocky Mountains into the Saskatchewan country is recognized and known to be an arid country. great irrigation works have been recently constructed north of the Montana line. Into that region train after train loaded with people from Montana, Utah, Idaho, Wyoming, North and South Dakota, Iowa, and Minnesota has gone to make their permanent homes. The movement has attracted wide attention and is a very curious movement, in view of the fact that we have as good or better lands in the public domain of the United

Mr. NEWLANDS. May I ask the Senator whether those lands are irrigated under Government projects or by private enterprise?

Mr. CARTER. I understand by private enterprise.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Then I will ask the Senator the further question whether we have any such large areas opened up for settlers in the arid region by private enterprise?

Mr. CARTER. I will reply to the Senator in that respect by saying that in the country immediately south of the Canadian line, where broad valleys of unmatched fertility exist, we have been badgered and beaten about with litigation by the United States Government in the interest of the Indians to such an extent that all progress has been stayed; and now, in a valley with which the Senator is familiar, the great Milk River Valley, in the northern part of Montana, where there is naught to be found save here and there an indication of a body of lignite coal of no commercial value, we find the entire country with-drawn and pronounced to be coal land, and subject to entry and purchase only at $20 an acre.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The question I wish to ask the Senator is one for information simply, and that is whether we have in our western region similar areas to those which the Senator has described in Canada, which are prepared by irrigation works and irrigation ditches under private enterprise for immediate settlement?

Mr. CARTER. The people go to Canada and themselves prepare the irrigation canals-

Mr. HEYBURN. They do in this country, too.
Mr. CARTER. Precisely as they would prepare them in the United States if an enlightened administration of the law obtained.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Let me say here that I quite differ with the Senator upon that proposition. When the irrigation movement in this country was inaugurated, it was practically admitted by all the men of the West that the era of private development of irrigated land had practically closed; that it was necessary for the Government to take up this great work; and it was upon that theory that the work was inaugurated.

There are no projects of any great extent being undertaken or capable of being undertaken by private enterprise, but the Government itself is opening up great irrigation enterprises, and settlement is rapidly taking place there.

So it seems to me Canada is now passing through the era through which we passed some time ago, of exhausting those areas which were within the reach of private enterprise. Canada has not yet exhausted those areas as we have, and the question now is what we shall do with the remaining areas which, so far as irrigation is concerned, it is admitted that private enterprise can not reach.

Mr. CARTER. Upon an examination of the facts the Senator from Nevada will ascertain, I think, that, in so far as the State of Montana is concerned, with its superb area of 146,000 square of Montana is concerned, with its superburiety for a million set-miles, there exists to-day ample opportunity for a million settlers to locate, develop homes, and maintain themselves. settlers who are undertaking to comply with the law in that country have become so utterly disgusted that many, many of them are moving over the line to where the government encourages rather than discourages the settler struggling to establish

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, what is true of Montana is true of the other Western States. It is a theory on the part of those living distant from a State that no other State except their own affords any satisfactory opportunity for settlement. I can say to the Senator from Nevada that there is room, when the door is opened again in Idaho, for a million people to make their homes; that they are making them as fast as they are permitted to make them, but that, as in Montana, they are hampered and driven back by onerous conditions, by prohibitions, and closed areas, so that the growth of the State is being impeded.

I had a letter from our Commissioner of Immigration a few days since in which he says, "I do not think it wise to send out for publication that the public lands of Idaho available to settlers are exhausted, but," he said, "it is becoming painfully apparent that unless Congress can relieve us in the near future there will be no room for more settlers except such as may come from the dividing up of existing holdings." That is a painful story to tell for a State as large as Idaho, with such a variety of natural resources as that State. It is true of the State of Utah; it is true of the State of Colorado.

We have not been able to secure the survey of the lands in the State of Idaho. We have the smallest per cent of surveyed lands of any State in the Union. I am asking this Congress, as I asked a former one, to give us $200,000 to survey the public lands, to mark them out upon the earth, so that we may know where rights may begin and end. I do not know what the result of this request will be. I hope to be able to secure that appropriation, coupled with a provision that shall prevent the application of the rule that no land shall be surveyed until a settler applies for it. Men will not settle on unsurveyed lands except under rare circumstances. Consequently, if you enforce the rule that the lands will not be surveyed until the settler applies for a survey, and if the settler will not settle until the lands are surveyed, there is a deadlock. That is where you are. That is the existing rule, and Congress ought to relieve us

The lands of Wyoming, I believe, are surveyed up to within 9 per cent of the total area; of Colorado, I believe, up to 5 per cent of the total area; and Idaho has about 42 per cent of her area surveyed. A large portion of that area is included within the forest reserves and is withdrawn from settlement, notwithstanding the fact that the act of Congress authorizing the creation of forest reserves did not contemplate including within those forest reserves mineral land or anything except forest land.

CREATING FOREST RESERVES OUT OF GRAZING LANDS.

Another thing, instead of confining themselves in creating forest reserves to forest lands, they are now openly and professedly and admittedly creating forest reserves out of grazing lands. They admit that there are no trees on them, but they say that in the absence of legislation governing the grazing lands of the United States the Forestry Service, as the great conservator of the peace and welfare of the people of the United States, feels justified in assuming a guardianship over these grazing lands, the product of which dies with every fall, in order that they may preserve what they created—a law—by applying the forestry law to the grazing land. Last year the profit from the grazing in the forest reserves was many times the total income from the forest reserves. So there is something of the system.

Land that will sustain cattle and horses and other stock when rented for that purpose by the Government is fit for homesteads, because a man may maintain a homestead by raising cattle and stock upon it and not work an acre of it. Yet there are to-day in Idaho more than 10,000,000 acres of land that is susceptible of home making, that will support human life and human families, that are rented for grazing purposes, which is proof that it will support the needs of man. Yet there are within forest reserves school districts, over thirty of them. The school districts only exist where there are school children and population, and the fact that they are there of their own selection is evidence that in the judgment of those settlers the lands are fit for settlement. That they should include within a forest reserve school districts is an anomalous condition, to say the least of it. Of post-offices that the Government establishes and maintains there are more than forty within these forest reserves. The Government only makes postoffices and maintains the carrying of mail to and from them when the neighborhood is sufficiently prosperous to bring a settlement there that will sustain and justify the post-office. it not seem strange? I hope you will inquire of the map that the Service has sent out showing how they have surrounded us with these deterrent elements that have stifled growth and that are sending emigration across the line to Canada at the that are sending emigration across the line to Canada at the rate of a hundred thousand a year. I have seen train after train of white covered wagons going to Canada. "Where are you going?" "We are going to Canada. We are going to British Columbia." "What for?" "We are going to settle up there. We are going to take up that wheat land." "Why not take up this land down in Idaho?" "Oh, well, you do not know where you will be to-morrow if you settle in Idaho. Probably a forest reserve will tie up your land."

A day or two ago I had a letter from one poor fellow out there who had been tied up for two years after he has com-there who had been tied up for two years after he has complied with every requirement. I suppose they are investigating him. I suppose some sleuth is on his way out there to see whether or not that fellow's house is a palace or whether it is a hovel. Homesteaders do not start with palaces.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President-

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will excuse me just a moment, I do not like to have an idea broken into. I will yield in a moment. In one instance they sent a photographer there to follow me, and published at the expense of the Government a large pamphlet here, to which I called the attention of the Senate on another occasion, that might be termed "the indict-ment of Senator Heyburn by the Government of the United They undertook to defend the establishment of these reserves, and among other things they sent a photographer out there to photograph the improvements which homesteaders had placed on the public lands, for the purpose not of immediate residence, but for the purpose of indicating their choice and selection of a homestead, to be taken advantage of as soon as it was surveyed and opened. Not being surveyed, they could not take even the initiative step of filing on it, but they built houses equal in standard to those that marked the settlements in Illinois and Iowa and Indiana or in Massachusetts. When the pioneers arrived on the shores of Massachusetts they did not bring brick blocks and barns with them. They made their brush huts and crept under a ledge of rocks as a protection from the weather and the storm.

I saw some of the houses that they photographed, and that they condemned as being unworthy of the settler. You can see them. They have them at the Forestry Department. They were better than the house in which Abraham Lincoln was born, or in which Garfield grew, or which many of the Presidents of the United States knew in their youth. They were fit homes for the settlement under the conditions existing at the time. those men can raise a crop or realize from the homestead they will build houses fast enough. I remember when I went to what is now a great wheat field that now produces one-tenth of the wheat of the United States. It lies right at our door. I remember the hovels the settlers built. They built them of sod; they built them of the cottonwood poles that grew along the little streams; they built them of reeds or anything that would shelter them. And they lived in them, too, and laid the foundation of their homes and laid the foundation of that country today that is the best-built country in the United States, that has best barns and the best houses and the best fences in the United States, and that raises the best wheat, and the most of it, in the United States. But they started there.

APPARENT OPPOSITION TO THE PIONEER.

In that critical spirit which has marked their attitude toward the pioneer from beginning to end they tell us, forsooth, that because the settler does not immediately build himself a house in which this expert would be willing to live, the expert will condemn it, and that his breath of condemnation shall reach us and influence us to repeal the law under which the settler is willing to live and obtain his home.

There is plenty of land in Idaho, and it is not arid land. the north of Idaho, where I live, God sends the sunshine and the rain, and we raise 40, 50, and 60 bushels of wheat to the acre without any irrigation. From one little depot where I was speaking during the last campaign, the agent told me forty-eight cars of apples had gone out up to to-day, in this season, and the season was in its midst. I saw at the Immigration Congress held at Boise City a few years ago a display of fruit raised on the Pend d'Oreille Forest Reserve that you can not equal in any State east of the Mississippi River. I know wheat fields above the station at Stites, in Idaho County, that are cut off in the middle by forest reserves, on which they raise 40 and 45 bushels of wheat. I know an orchard that lies right up to the border of that reserve in that same county that raised the finest apples I ever saw grow, the trees full of them; and that is bounded by the forest reserve line. Think you that God made the earth with such lines as that, that the fertility stops so short as that? Then you may go all through the irrigated country, down in the valleys where the lands of the Senator from Nevada lie. I remember when he turned the water on them, I think. them as barren as the Desert of Sahara on one side of the fence and the alfalfa blooming in its glory on the other side. I know the lands in those States pretty well. Fertility is not at all a question of geography there. It is not bounded by such sharp lines that a fence justifies the establishment of a forest reserve. Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield

to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. Pres Mr. President, I am in full sympathy with the Senator from Idaho in any effort that he may make to do away with unfair and improper restrictions upon the development of the West. But I wish to call his attention to one fact. For six years or more the executive department of the Government has been calling our attention to the necessity of amending the land laws so as to meet not only the economic requirements of the West, but also to prevent the absorption of large areas of land by monopolies and trusts and for the promotion of the interests of the home seekers.

Now, let me go just one step farther. I asked the Senator yesterday whether he thought the laws were adapted to the economic requirements of the West, whether they were so framed as to prevent timber lands and coal lands from getting into the control of great combinations and trusts, whether the grazing lands are so administered as to tend to the full development of the West, and to-day, with reference to three or four of these laws, he has admitted that they are defective and that they require amendment.

I wish to call the Senator's attention to one thing, that Congress has intrusted, and, I believe, is willing to intrust, the legislation regarding these public lands to the judgment of the men of the West; that the men of the West constitute a preponderating influence in the committees of the Senate and House upon public lands; that admitted defects exist in the law, and yet, as a result either of our difference of views or of our inertia upon this matter, we have never yet undertaken the reform legislation absolutely necessary to properly develop the West and to bring the land laws in harmony with its proper and just development.

Now, that is what I complain of. I complain of Congress just as the Senator complains of the executive department in the administration of these laws. I think we are at fault, and more at fault than the executive department, which has sought through administration to correct evils that we ought to correct by law.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I am thoroughly in accord the Separar, that primarily questions with the suggestion of the Senator, that primarily questions affecting the public lands which lie wholly in the West should be considered by those who are most nearly and closely con-nected with the subject. That is simply reasonable. But the Senator will realize that questions affecting those interests, which, while immense in their area and extent and application, are with great difficulty brought to the close and diligent attention of those from the more distant States in the East. We realize that difficulty. However, I am gratified to the extreme by the interest which is being and has been taken in the discussion of this question by able Senators from the Atlantic States and the intervening States, and I hope for much good. But we can not yet lay this question aside. It must be considered. We must have an expression of opinion from other Senators representing public land States; and I hope that the question will remain before the Senate until it can be thoroughly considered.

Mr. President-

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I wish to suggest to the Senator that as important as this matter is, and I admit its full importance, the Senate is so thin that, of course, no action can be taken now. There are a good many matters of urgent business that ought to be attended to before we adjourn, and I ask the Senator if he will yield, holding the floor, in order that I may make a motion as to the order of business

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield for that purpose.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the message from the House of Representatives relative to the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill be laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 24538) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908, and asking a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice-President appointed Mr. HALE, Mr. CULLOM, and Mr. TELLER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

SARAH R. HARRINGTON.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 21579) granting an increase of pension to Sarah R. Harrington and asking a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment and agree to the conference asked for by the House, and that the conferees be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice-President appointed Mr. McCumber, Mr. Scott, and Mr. Taliaferro as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 7760) to authorize the Albany Railroad Bridge Company or the Chicago and Northwestern Railway Company to reconstruct a bridge across the Mississippi River; which were, on page 2, line 12, to strike out "two years" and insert "one year;" and on page 2, line 12, to strike out "five years" and insert "three years."

Mr. HOPKINS. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

A. J. STINSON.

Mr. PETTUS. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4300) for the relief of A. J. Stinson, reported to-day from the Committee on Claims.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to pay $468 to A. J. Stinson, being the amount of permanent improvements, including fee and com-mission for entry, made on a homestead, entered in Alabama under the laws of the United States, of which he was afterwards dispossessed and his entry canceled on account of a prior claim of entry granted by the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN STINSON.

Mr. PETTUS. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4299) for the relief of John Stinson, reported to-day from the Committee on Claims.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to pay $318 to John Stinson, being the amount of permanent improvements, including fee and commission for entry, made on a homestead entered in Alabama under the laws of the United States, of which he was afterwards dispossessed and his entry canceled on account of a prior claim of entry granted by the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for a reprint of report No. 6901, to accompany Senate bill 976. The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] Chair hears no objection.

CIRCUIT AND DISTRICT COURTS AT BELLINGHAM, WASH.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 21383) providing that terms of the circuit court of the United States for the western district and for the district court of the United States for the northern division of the western district of the State of Washington be held at Bellingham.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in addition to the times and places now fixed by law for the setting of the circuit court of the United States for the western district of Washington there shall be sessions of the said circuit court in the city of Bellingham, beginning on the first Tuesday of April and October of each year hereafter.

Sec. 3. That the terms of said courts shall not be limited to any particular number of days nor shall it be necessary to adjourn by reason of the intervention of a term elsewhere, but the court intervening may be adjourned until the business of the court in session is concluded.

Sec. 4. That the city of Bellingham shall furnish a satisfy.

SEC. 4. That the city of Bellingham shall furnish a suitable room in which to hold said court, and light and heat the same without any expense to the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time: was read the third time, and passed.

WITHDRAWAL FROM BOND, TAX FREE, OF DENATURED ALCOHOL, ETC.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, by instruction of the Committee on Ways and Means I present for printing and reference a privileged report on the bill H. R. 24816.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

The bill (H. R. 24816) to amend an act entitled "An act for the withdrawal from bond tax free of domestic alcohol when rendered unfit for beverage or liquid medicinal uses by mixture with suitable denaturing meterials," approved June 7, 1906.

The SPEAKER. Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

SALMON FISHERIES IN ALASKA.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a rereference of the bill H. R. 24755.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill. Mr. GROSVENOR. And I ask that it be referred from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The bill (H. R. 24755) entitled "A bill to encourage private salmon hatcheries in Alaska."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks for its reference from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries to the Committee on the Public Lands. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday of this week I had asked for unanimous consent for consideration of the Senate amendments to the urgent deficiency bill, and that they might be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House. At that time objection was made to such consideration. I believe that it was made then under a misap-prehension, and therefore I would now renew my request for unanimous consent that the urgent deficiency bill (H. R. 24541) be taken from the Speaker's table and that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. As the Chair understands the gentleman's request, he asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the urgent deficiency bill with Senate amendments and to consider the same in the House as in Committee of the Whole House under the hour rule. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to say inquiry was made yesterday as to whether the Committee on Appropriations had yet considered that bill, and it was answered in the negative, and I know some gentlemen desired to be present when it was considered whom I do not see here this morning. In fact, I see there are quite a number of people absent who do not seem to have had the information they desired to have, and for that reason I shall object to this being taken up at this time.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 24991, the river and harbor appropriation bill, and pending that motion I ask unanimous consent that the chairman of the committee may have authority to apportion less time than an hour to Members who desire to be heard upon the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand the gentleman's statement.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. The request is that the Chairman of the Whole House on the state of the Union may have authority to apportion time less than an hour to speakers who desire to be heard on the bill. As I understand the rule, when a Member obtains the floor he is entitled to an hour unless authority exists to apportion a less time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Burton] asks unanimous consent that the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, in the consideration of the river and harbor appropriation bill, shall have the right to recognize Members, fixing the time that they shall speak for less than one hour, in his discretion. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as I understand the proposition I do not think I have any objection to it; that is, that the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union may recognize any Member for less than an hour, but that otherwise it would come under the hour rule; and he can not extend the time, except by unanimous consent of the committee, beyond the hour. I want to say in that connection that I shall object hereafter at this stage of the session to allowing anyone, Member of the House, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, or otherwise, to grant unlimited time to any other Member or any time beyond the hour, except by the unanimous consent of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union at the time. As I understand, this is a request to recognize for a shorter time than an hour or for an hour.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I want to say this about this bill—and if I have to reserve any right to object, I will—that I would be perfectly willing, as far as I am individually concerned, to see the gentleman who is going to preside in this matter parcel the time, because he has demonstrated over and over again that he is a fair presiding officer. I refer to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. Currier], and I am glad to say this. I have raised the point of no quorum two or three times and then called for tellers, and it always panned out as he counted in the beginning. [Laughter.]

What I wanted to say was this, that while I would be perfeetly willing for the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. Curcerned. I do not like that way of doing business generally, because somebody might act as Chairman sometime on an important bill who would chouse us out of an equal show, and if this happens now I want it distinctly understood it is not to be taken So far as I am concerned, I would rather that as a precedent. the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Burton], representing the Republicans, and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], representing the Democrats, should parcel this time out.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to say to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Clark] I want to say the general was not not be several years ago, and the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House recognition nized different Members for 20 minutes or half an hour, and that thing was universally conceded, so that at the end of the half hour time was called upon the gentleman who was addressing the committee and he took his seat. This thing has been done before, and it has been done very successfully, even with-

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I want to interpolate, Mr. Speaker, that I do not have any trouble getting time in the House pretty nearly when I want it, but away back when I first came here I was extremely anxious to make a speech in the daytime on a bill here, and the Chairman presiding just simply shut me out and would not let me do it, and I have had a very lively recollection of that performance ever since.

Mr. PAYNE. Nothing of that kind could be done to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Clark] in his early days here unless by unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know it can not be done now. Nobody is disposed to do it. I am not afraid of the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. Currier] being unfair about it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I am inclined to the opinion, sir, that if the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors will renew this morning his motion of yesterday evening, or rather his suggestion, that we can get an agreement upon that that would be satisfactory to all parties at interest, if he feels inclined to do that.

Mr. MANN. I hope the chairman will make that request.

because I shall object to the present request.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me we have had a deal of unnecessary tangle about this apportionment of time. It seemed to be decided last night that the time should be under the control of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole. I will say preliminary to the request I shall make, that the circumstances under which this bill is to be discussed There is no organized opposition to the bill as a measure; but there are certain persons who desire to be heard on behalf of specific projects not included. I do not care and do not desire to take the responsibility of apportioning this time or have it; but I am inclined to think it would be best, and therefore I renew the request that the apportionment of the time be under my control jointly with the gentleman from Alabama. Mr. PAYNE. I shall object to any motion to give more than an hour to any Member.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I will state to the gentleman from

New York that there is no such intention on my part.

Mr. PAYNE. I have no objection to anybody portioning out the time if it is done in such way that no gentleman can be rec-ognized beyond the hour without unanimous consent of the com-

Mr. DALZELL. I shall object to the time being under the control of gentlemen who are in favor of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the indulgence of the House for a moment. It has been the observation of the Chair that there may have been various times toward the end of the session when gentlemen desire to talk and time could not be given, but the Chair has observed that the chairman of the committee, in the absence of any unanimous consent, could arrange the time fairly well within the limits that the House concluded the bill ought to be considered.

The question was taken on the motion to go into Committee of the Whole

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. CURRIER in the chair. The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill

H. R. 24991, the river and harbor bill.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, the aggregate of appropriations and of authorizations in this bill is larger than in any previous river and harbor bill ever presented to Congress. total amount is $83,816,138, of which approximately $35,-000,000 is made up of appropriations for expenditures during the ensuing fiscal year and $48,000,000 in authorizations for expenditures in succeeding years. I may say that of the amount actually appropriated—$35,000,000—probably not more than $25,-000,000 at the outside will be expended during the ensuing fiscal year, because in a number of cases provision is made for maintenance for two years instead of one. This arises from the custom of passing a river and harbor bill only biennially. This arises from In a preceding bill—that of 1896—the authorizations amounted to $59,000,000-more than in this bill-but the totals in this measure exceed the bill of 1896 by $11,000,000.

I wish to say to the House that, in my judgment, this it not only the largest river and harbor bill ever presented, but it is the best. It has certain distinctive features. In the first place, an unusual number of improvements are to be pressed to completion, and full provision is made for the total amount required to finish the work undertaken. In the next place, not one new project is provided for unless a sufficient amount is appropriated or authorized to complete it. This policy is one toward which we have been aiming for some eight or ten years, but satisfactory results along this line have not been attained until now. Of the total amount of more than $83,000,000 carried in the bill, $68,717,000 is for projects of considerable magnitude now under way or in connection with which additional facilities are required. I will mention the most prominent of

The largest appropriation and authorization for a harbor is that for the 35-foot channel leading from the city of Boston to the sea, the total amount required to complete which is $4,-The next largest amount for a harbor is that for the completion of the improvement of the Southwest Pass of the Mississippi River, amounting to $2,500,000. Provision is made for the completion of the so-called "Ambrose channel," leading from New York City to the sea; for the improvement of the Delaware, leading from Philadelphia to the sea, and its completion, and for the completion of the channel leading from Baltimore to the sea.

In addition to these large amounts for harbors, generous provision is made for the Mississippi River and for the connecting channels of the Great Lakes. In addition to the amount appropriated for the Southwest Pass, which furnishes the inlet and outlet from the Gulf to the Mississippi River, an aggregate of $12,145,000 is provided for the Mississippi River, which it is expected will meet all requirements for four years, and appropriations and authorizations of between twelve and thirteen millions for the connecting channels of the Great Lakes, where two great improvements are provided for-an additional lock for the St. Marys River, connecting Lakes Superior and Huron, and an alternative channel in the Detroit River, where the traffic has become so large as to imperatively require more room.

Each of these two improvements is to cost somewhat in excess of $6,000,000. For harbors of what may be called secondary rank provision is made as well. The sum of $1,000,000 is appropriated and authorized for the city of Savannah and $1,132,000 for the city of Norfolk, where the tonnage has reached a very great magnitude. The sum of $1,000,000 is appropriated for the channel from Galveston to the sea and $150,000 for the improvement of the interior harbor. This harbor has shown a growth which is phenomenal, so that it is now stated that in the value of the exports it is second only to New York City. In the report which has been filed these different improvements have been divided into two classes; first, those in which the appropriation and authorization aggregate more than $1,000,000, and, second, those where the amount is more than $200,000, but less than $1,000,000.

In the projects of secondary or minor rank provision is made for a very considerable number of places. These are set forth in the report filed with the bill. So much for the pending projects.

The committee also recommend new projects, for which, as I said, provision is made for completion at a cost of $5,038,000. most important of these are for the city of New Bedford, in Massachusetts, where increased anchorage room and depth are required, to provide which $300,000 is appropriated and authorized; for Coney Island channel, which affords a relief outlet from New York Harbor to the sea; for Cold Springs inlet, at Cape May, where provision is made for the expenditure of $1,211,000 under certain conditions, one of which is that the sum of $100,000 is to be supplied in that locality to be expended upon the improvement by the Secretary of War.

Also provision is made for the Passaic River and Newark Bay, where there is an appropriation and authorization of $850,000. The traffic here has increased with very rapid strides, and the provision already made for this very important commercial and industrial center, Newark, is not large in comparison with that made for other places.

Among other new projects new appropriations have been made for inland or intercoastal waterways, one in the State of Louisiana, at a total expense of $289,000, and one in Texas at an expense of $433,000.

There are also two other items, one for St. Michaels Canal, in Alaska, providing for a safe means of transit from the mouth of the Yukon River to the nearest harbor, this improvement being made desirable by the fact that at present life and property are very much jeopardized in taking the dangerous trip between

For the Hawaiian Islands, at Hilo Harbor, $400,000 is appropriated and authorized. Here a breakwater to aid and give safe entrance to the only harbor on the most important, or at least the most fertile and productive, of the Hawaiian Islands was examined and reported, at a cost of $1,700,000. The committee did not think best to recommend all of this amount, but recommended a portion of it, which it is thought will give substantial relief to traffic, affixing a condition that none of the amount is to be expended unless, on further examination, it meets the approval of the Chief of Engineers.

An appropriation and authorization of $757,500 is made for the port of San Juan, in the island of Porto Rico. A majority of the members of the committee visited this island two years ago the coming March. Three or four ports were examined. It was thought that in two of them, Mayaguez and Ponce, no improvements should be made at national expense, but that the other harbor was worthy of improvement. A report of the Chief of Engineers recommends an expenditure of about $1,000,-000; but on consultation it seems that the amount named, $757,500, will be sufficient to afford additional room and proper The aim of the appropriation is to provide a depth of 30 feet at the entrance and in suitable anchorage ground inside Smaller projects are not neglected. The bill carries some larger appropriations for these than was included in preceding Among them I may name the three rivers of South Carolina, the Santee, the Congaree, and Wateree rivers; the Chattahoochee River, on the line between Georgia and Alabama; the Alabama River, in Alabama, and the Pawtucket River, in Rhode Island.

Some years ago there was an earnest discussion in the House with reference to the Missouri River, and it did not seem best to continue the very expensive improvement which had been undertaken upon that stream. In the last year, however, there has been a revival of the movement for navigation. Both at Kansas City and at Omaha it is contemplated that boats will be built for river traffic. The committee thought best to recommend an expenditure of $300,000 for the Missouri, $150,000 to be expended below Kansas City, $100,000 between Kansas City and Sioux City, and $50,000 above Sioux City. This amount is primarily to be used for clearing the river of snags. Unfortunately it is a stream which does not yield favorable results to treatment by dredging, although here and there a little dredging may be done. It is the opinion of the committee that there is no middle ground between improvements of this nature and a very extensive improvement, costing as much as $100,000 a mile below Sioux City and $38,500 a mile above that place. That is the estimate of the engineering board which has passed upon it.

It is desired, however, that a fair trial be given, and if traffic is developed further appropriations may be made. I can not see why upon this great river, with the large towns upon it, some navigation should not develop and be maintained.

largely caused by railway competition, the sufficiency of the railways for the carriage of freight, and the extreme difficulty of securing satisfactory results in its improvement. I would state that the committee in prior years thought best to abandon the large appropriations, and I think they would still be of that opinion largely because of the enormous expense required, and further because it appeared that although $10,000,000 had been expended this amount had been disbursed very largely over only a limited area of the river.

The smaller streams which may be called distinctly local are not omitted in the bill. Some question may be raised as to the propriety of improving a mere local stream at national expense. Great care no doubt should be used to exclude creeks and rivers so insignificant as to give no promise of favorable results. But I desire to say to the committee that the appropriations made for many of these little streams have been quite as beneficial as any river and harbor appropriations that have been made.

our years and a half ago I called attention to the prevalent misapprehension entertained by many in the country that a very large share of our bill is made up of provisions for creeks and rivers of trivial importance. In my remarks then I pointed out that in the pending bill, that of 1902, the total amount appropriated for streams having a traffic of a tonnage of less than 100,000, of a value of less than $1,000,000, was $417,000, and this amount was for two years.

In the present bill appropriation is made for some streams of this class where no traffic has already developed. In some cases a considerable amount is appropriated, with the hope that a considerable commerce will follow, but that which is recommended for these local streams where there is an existing traffic is not materially in excess of the amount in the bill in 1902. It will aggregate less than $500,000.

For the information of the committee I desire to allude to some figures which will display the importance of this traffic on small streams.

The Thames River, Connecticut, has a tonnage of 446,004 tons, The appropriation in this bill is $30,000. The Bronx River and East Chester Creek, in New York, both emptying into Long Island Sound, have a tonnage of 387,368 tons, and we appropriate $29,000. Mantua Creek, New Jersey, has a tonnage of 136,105 tons, and we appropriate $34,450, a part of which is for improvements which will render the expense hereafter less year by year.

Raccoon Creek, New Jersey, has a tonnage of 263,317 tons, and the committee recommends an appropriation of $15,000. Smyrna River (Duck Creek), Delaware, has a tonnage of 204,731 tons, and for this we recommend an appropriation of $2,000.

Nanticoke River, in Delaware and Maryland, has a tonnage of 121,769, for which the same sum, $2,000, is recommended. The Neuse and Trent rivers, North Carolina, have a tonnage of 731,534, for which an appropriation is recommended of $30,000. The Waccamaw River, North Carolina and South Carolina, has a tonnage of 207,630, for which we recommend an appropriation of $20,000. The St. Johns River, Florida, above Jacksonville. has a tonnage of 269,610, for which we recommend an appropriation of $25,000. The White River, Arkansas, has a tonnage of 100,083, for which we recommend an appropriation of $30,000. The French Broad and Little Pigeon rivers, Tennessee, have a tonnage of 188,700, for which we recommend an appropriation of $2,000. The Petaluma Creek and Napa River, California, have a tonnage of 404,983, for which an appropriation is recommended of $23,239, part of which is for additional improvements. The Okanogan and Pend Oreille rivers, Washington, have a tonnage of 55,917, for which we recommend an appropriation of $20,000. The tonnage on these little streams compares very favorably with some of the larger streams of the country. fact, there are three or four in the list that I have read having a greater tonnage or traffic than that portion of the Mississippi River between the mouth of the Missouri and the mouth of the Ohio.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. KEIFER. I desire an explanation. When the gentleman speaks of tonnage at these several places, I wish he would explain what he means by it.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. The number of tons of freight car-

Mr. KEIFER. How often?
Mr. BURTON of Ohio. A year. I have spoken of these things so frequently that I forget sometimes to state that, else

I would have called attention to it.

The general provisions in the bill are not numerous. There is the usual section in regard to surveys and examinations. fact that it has been in such a state of decadence has been. There is a section directing the printing of 3,000 copies of a compilation of the laws of the United States. This same section practically was included in a prior bill, but the book was not ready for printing until after the prescribed time, so it is necessary to reinclude it here. The committee recommends the repeal of a section contained in the act of 1904, forbidding the building of dredges for the prosecution of Government work north of Cape Henry, or on the Great Lakes, without express legislative authority. While I think no member of the committee desires to commit himself to the idea that this work of dredging shall be done entirely or even prevailingly by Government dredges, it seems in the first place illogical to make a geographical division of this kind. The provisions should be uniform throughout the country. If it is a good rule north of Cape Henry, it is a good rule south of Cape Henry as well. If it is desirable to forbid the building of dredges on the Great Lakes without express legislative authority, it is also desirable to forbid it on the Gulf of Mexico, and it seemed best to give general authority to the Engineering Department to apportion such part of the appropriations to any harbor or river which they might think desirable to the construction of dredges. largely a question of conditions. We may make an appropriation for a river and harbor and it will be desired to improve it, but no dredging outfit is available. Perhaps no dredging outfit can be obtained at all; and if one can be obtained, it is not suitable for the work. So the appropriation is held up and nothing done Again, in numerous harbors of the country dredging is required the year round, because the channels are constantly filling. If this work is done by contract the dredger will go and perform his work in one or two months and then go away and leave it for the remaining ten months. During those ten months there will be divers fills, and the depth of the channel may very materially diminish. In such cases as this it is extremely desirable that a dredge be at hand, owned by the Government, under the control of the engineer who may go out and remedy the situation. We have added to this section, however, a provision that a contract may be made with the owners of private dredges under which they shall have a reasonable allowance for deterioration and such percentage added to the cost of the work as may be equitable. Thus the private dredger can do the work as the agent of the Government. This will tend to provide against any injustice or hardship which may

The committee has recommended the extension of the jurisdiction of the International Waterways Commission created by the act of 1902. In the act of 1902 it was provided that a commission should be created to act jointly with one created by Great Britain to consider questions relating to boundary by Great Britain to Consider questions waters between the United States and Canada. A great many imitating questions were constantly arising. The control of the waters between the two countries is necessarily international. In the Detroit River or in those channels that are on the boundary line, the master of a vessel does not for a moment hesitate to know whether he is in the waters of the United States or the waters of Canada. It is exceedingly desirable that the joint waterway may be improved and that it be under the jurisdiction of, or at least that it be supervised by, a commission which can make recommendations. The section as originally drawn seemed to point to jurisdiction over all connecting waters between the United States and Canada, but its operation was limited by our officials to the Great Lakes and connecting The Canadian government earnestly desired that this jurisdiction be extended to include all waters, and this section is largely inserted in response to that desire. I would say, however, to the committee that as a general policy it seems to me also desirable that we should include all boundary waters between the United States and Canada.

In this bill we have included only projects reported by a board of reviewing engineers created by the act of 1902.

It has seemed necessary to draw the line somewhere. previous occasions I have called attention to the fact that we have on our books $400,000,000 of projects incomplete or recommended for adoption. We have been laboring under this burden in every bill which we have presented. This makes the river and harbor appropriation bill a more difficult measure than any presented in this House, or, at least, than any appropriation bill, because in most appropriation bills the amounts follow very closely the recommendations of the Executive Departments-perhaps a few millions more or less-but we have been compelled in each measure we have brought in to select less than a hundred million dollars from $400,000,000 which might be expended, and it has seemed desirable to draw the line with those improvements which had the recommendation of this board of review. In some instances there has been some slight variation from that rule when on revision by the Chief of Engineers some project was recalled, but that has been the general rule we have followed.

Mr. GRAFF. Does the gentleman mean to indicate there have been no appropriations provided for in this bill which have not received a favorable report of the board of engineers as to their advisability?

Mr. BURTON of Onio. I do so state that is substantially the case, except, of course, in the case of pending projects, not finished, which have never gone to the board of review.

Mr. GRAFF. Are there not projects provided for in this bill which have not received a favorable report of the board of engineers as to their advisability?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I do not know of any.
Mr. GRAFF. Is that true of the project at Cape May?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I so understand it.
Mr. GRAFF. Of course the gentleman would know whether that is true or not.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I would state in regard to that project it is one of six which did not come to my immediate atten-

Mr. GRAFF. Was that recommendation on the ground of its commercial necessity?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Yes, sir; as a harbor of refuge, for the construction of which there was a large amount contributed by the locality-some $3,000,000 used to dig out an inner harbor. It was thought the Government might very naturally secure this harbor of refuge and harbor by providing for the entrance to it.

Mr. GRAFF. I do not understand the gentleman knows positively whether there was a favorable report by the board of engineers.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I so understood; but I will state this is one of six which I did not examine with quite as much detail as others, and this leads me to state in regard to the very large project of an inner waterway from Chicago to St. Louis the committee decided not to include that in this bill. In the first place, it is the largest indivisible project ever recommended, or certainly for river and harbor improvements in the United It is true more money has been spent on the Mississippi River below Cairo. There is a pending project for improving the Ohio River which would cost more, but it is divisible in a sense and this is not. It seemed to us, in view of the fact that scores, even hundreds, of projects have been waiting five or ten years, we ought not to take this up when in fact there had been no agitation for it until about six weeks before this bill was reported. It was too great a project to undertake on so short notice. We are trying to get away from the old dribbling policy of appropriating a little here and a little there, and not obtaining complete results anywhere; thus we are pursuing the policy in this bill of undertaking nothing unless it is finished. We were asked in this case to appropriate $3,000,000 on a $31,000,000 project. It did not seem to the committee desirable to do that. If it is to be taken up at all, let it be taken up in its entirety. Let Congress face the question and not say we will spend $3,000,000 to make a feeble beginning, but we will spend $31,000,000 to finish it. Again, it is but a part of the great waterway which is advocated from the Lakes to the Gulf.

There is no survey of any 14-foot waterway from St. Louis to the Gulf, and it does not seem to us desirable to take up this part until we know what the cost will be and what the desirability will be of improving the rest of it from St. Louis to I do not wish to be understood as throwing this over our shoulders. It is possible that under an enlarged and more liberal policy of improving the waterways of the country the people may take this up, but it would be out of proportion to anything we are doing now, and if we do undertake it let us have our eyes open and know just how much it will cost to carry it through.

Again, this project was taken up and considered by this board of review, and they made an adverse report upon it. I do not think it would be quite fair to have refused to make appropriations costing one hundred thousand or two hundred thousand dollars, because it lacked that favorable report, and bring one in here for $31,000,000.

Mr. HEPBURN and Mr. MADDEN rose.

To whom does the gentleman from Ohio The CHAIRMAN. [Mr. Burton] yield?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I will yield first to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. HEPBURN. I simply want to ask the gentleman, not to interrupt the current of his speech, to describe this particular waterway

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. It is a proposition for a waterway continuing the drainage canal, extending some 30 miles from Lake Michigan—I believe that is about the distance.

Mr. MADDEN. Forty.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Through the Des Plaines and Illinois rivers to the Mississippi, securing a depth of 14 feet for through communication from Chicago to St. Louis.

Mr. MADDEN. I wanted to know whether the board of engineers who made the survey reported as to the feasibility of

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I would state that the board of engineers who made the survey reported that it was feasible. I want to say something in that connection. The assertion has been repeatedly made that this board favored it, and I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] if he is willing to leave this question to that board that made the survey and let them come together again and report whether it is desirable

Mr. MADDEN. I feel that the board of engineers who have no practical knowledge on great commercial—

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. The gentleman will note that I asked him a question.

Mr. MADDEN. Is not qualified-

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I asked the gentleman a question.

Mr. MADDEN. I am answering the question. I say such a board is not qualified to settle a great commercial question, and therefore I would not be willing to leave for them the decision of a proposition that ought to be settled by business men who have developed the country. And I would like to ask the gentleman one more question if he will yield.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. And that is, what recommendation the board of engineers made on the Cold Springs Harbor proposition?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I have already talked with the gentleman's colleague about that. I will say, when that item is reached under the five-minute rule, or any other time, I desire to have it fully debated. Another thing: The gentleman says he would rather leave it to good business men and not to engi-I remember that about sixteen years ago there was an agitation here for the Hennepin Canal—a canal across Illinois. There was just the same airy nonchalance and contempt for expert knowledge. It was said that we ought to leave it to business men-a very vague, indefinite statement. What is a business man? There are different qualities of business men. Is he a boomer, who wants money spent in his locality? There was the same questioning of motives and abuse of whoever stood in its way. The Government undertook the project, and I want to say to the gentlemen of the committee that after six millions and a half of dollars had been spent on that Hennepin Canal the Committee on Rivers and Harbors debated a long while whether it was better to spend $500,000 more to finish it or whether it was not best to abandon it entirely.

Will the gentleman yield for a question? Mr. GRAFF.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Certainly.

I desire to state that the controlling factor in Mr. GRAFF. the initiative of that enterprise and the appropriations by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors was the fact that the gentleman, my good friend Gen. T. J. Henderson, who lived in that district and represented it here in Congress was chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. He at that time domi-nated the committee, a thing which I do not know whether or not is true in the same degree at the present time. [Laughter.] It was not on account of the fact that there was a great area of territory popularly asking for the initiating of this enterprise. It was because of the great interest of the gentleman who happened to be chairman of the committee.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I am glad to hear some explanation of that, because I have found so many Members of Congress that were ashamed of it. The gentleman says that that was adopted because of the dominating influence of the chairman of the River and Harbor Committee. Would it not be a good idea to have some reform? If dominating influence was exerted to foist such a scheme as that on the country, would it not be better now that the chairman exercise his so-called "dominating influence" in repressing a few similar schemes that appear in the

[Applause.]

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to inquire of the gentleman whether the Committee on Rivers and Harbors requested this board of review for rivers and harbors to report the scheme instead of this waterway? Mr. BURTON of Ohio. They did.

Mr. RAINEY. Under what authority did the committee make that request?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Under a statute, and why-

Mr. RAINEY. Will the gentleman permit me to read the statute now?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I am unwilling to have my time taken in that way. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has twenty minutes.

Mr. RAINEY. I think that the authority conferred by the statute extends to nothing else except projects approved by Congress and projects entered upon by Congress. This has neither been approved nor has any appropriation been made for it, and the statute provides for the reference by the committee of only these two.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. The gentleman is in error. I trust he will make his statement in his own time.

Why was it left to this board of review? The original statute for it in 1902 did not provide for any report upon its de-sirability. I think that was unfair. If I have anything to do in this committee, or if I can be heard in this House outside of the committee, then there shall be no more surveys of any river and harbor unless we are to have some report upon their desirability. The committee did not think it was fair to make this exception as compared with other projects in the country, because the plans for improvements were submitted to a review by that board wherever they might be; and if it required a straining of the statute to refer this proposed waterway to them, then we were justified in so doing, just as we have done in all other cases, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Loriner], a member of the committee, absolutely acquiesced in the action of the committee; he himself said it was fair.

Done without authority of law.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman allow me to inter-

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, there is very strong impression in my country that this reviewing board which the gentleman mentions is merely an appendix to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors by which that committee not only shapes its own actions, but its engineer reports.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I can not account for all the impressions which prevail in the gentleman's locality. Some one takes a great deal of interest in sending me practically every other day a lot of clippings of impressions, impressions like those the gentleman speaks of, that are so laden with misstatements and misrepresentations that I can not account for them.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Assuming that the chairman is perfectly correct in the proposition that no additional survey should be granted except where work previously authorized has been completed, may I ask whether he will not accord the same privilege to the city of Philadelphia, where a survey for 35 feet has been asked and refused, when the same character of surveys, for 35 feet, have been granted to the ports of New York, Baltimore, and Boston?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I would like to say to the gentleman that the radical misapprehension under which he and those who favor a 35-foot survey labor is this: They do not realize the difference between an inland port, 60 miles or more up a river, and one which is upon a bay opening out to the sea. I once asked a commercial body at Philadelphia to state a single case of a port similarly located which would have a greater depth at high and low tide than Philadelphia will have when the 30foot channel is completed. I showed them the list to select from, which includes a great many of the greatest ports in the world, Rotterdam, Hamburg, London, Antwerp, and some of the larger ports in the world, and the answer to that is never made, simply because they can not find an illustration where there is a similar port in the world that will have a greater depth than Philadelphia will have—that is, where expensive and elaborate treatment is required for the channel.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask the gentleman to explain whether Baltimore is not very much in the same position as Philadelphia?

Mr. Burton of Ohio. Not at all. It is true it is some distance from the sea, but the Patapsco River below yields readily to treatment, and length of the channel to the open sea which requires deepening is perhaps a third or two-fifths as great. A table was prepared, which the gentleman might read with interest, that tells the whole story. It shows that New York, Baltimore, and Boston have always retained increased depth, while at Philadelphia, such is the action of the river below, the depth can only be maintained, when once acquired, with very great difficulty.

Mr. MORRELL. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will allow

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. If I can have an extension of time,

I shall be glad to answer questions.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I desire to ask these questions merely for the information of the House. Is it not a fact that Philadelphia has asked for a 35-foot survey, in anticipation, which has been denied by the committee, whereas similar surveys have been granted to these three competitive ports along the Atlantic seaboard?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. It is not a fact in the sense in which you ask the question at all. It is true this rule was not made until 1902. It was the result of growth and consideration, but of late the rule has been enforced. Of course there are one or two apparent exceptions in Senate amendments, one with reference to Savannah and one with reference to Galveston; but the general rule has been as I state. Then there have possibly been trivial exceptions. I will state to the gentleman that there is an additional reason with reference to the survey for a 35-foot channel at Philadelphia. The report states that whether 30 feet can be maintained without prohibitive cost can only be determined by trial. It did not seem to the committee desirable to order a 35-foot survey in the face of such a warning as that.

I want to say to the gentleman that I believe he and all his constituents are going to be satisfied with the provision made in this bill. We are seeking to get this 30-foot channel as soon as practicable. We piled on $500,000 in addition to the estimates. Why? I take the responsibility for that. I do not believe the engineer's estimate is large enough, or authorized it to be expended, and when you have a 30-foot channel I trust you will all be satisfied.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. We have no fault at all to find with the appropriation for the 30-foot channel, and I have asked the gentleman these questions in order that we might later on have it understood that we desire to be placed in the same position with our competitive ports.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. You never can be placed in the same position with these three other Atlantic ports. Nature determined that, not the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it not true that the engineers have reported that this matter of the deepening of the channel is feasible?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. They have reported that deepening it to 30 feet is feasible.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And the deepening to 35 feet is a matter to be determined by trial?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. There is no survey on that and no report; but I want to say to the gentleman that if that 30-foot channel is found to be capable, after trial, of being maintained without prohibitive cost, it must be maintained even if it cost $200,000 a year to do it; and the gentleman will find me the last one to object to a 35-foot survey, if on trial the 30-foot channel is found to be practicable; but it would be a vicious business policy to go ahead now and provide for a 35-foot survey before you know whether you can maintain even 30 feet.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then the gentleman is not opposed to a 35-foot channel if it is proved to be feasible.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Of course, under proper circumstances. The proof of whether it is feasible or not is first to try the 30-foot channel.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then the gentleman does not object to our asking, most courteously of course, to have a survey authorized in order that we may ascertain the cost of reaching a 35-foot channel.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I do not know exactly what road the gentleman is traveling just now. [Laughter.] I would rather not answer that question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. We want to get equality with other ports on the Atlantic coast, a proposition which I think will some day appeal to the Members of the House.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. It appeals to us now, but the gentleman must remember that in all the past years, since the Government began to improve harbors, the difference between the depth at Philadelphia and these other ports has been as great or greater than it is now.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But our commerce I think would warrant our asking that Philadelphia be placed in a similiar position with other ports that do a competitive business.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. The commerce of Philadelphia is very large, there is no doubt about that.

Mr. MORRELL. Is it not true, from the statement of the engineer in charge, that only one dredge would be required to keep the river open at a depth of 30 feet?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Only one dredge?

Mr. MORRELL. Yes; that is, as I remember it.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I do not believe that one dredge would do it, and I am not aware that he has made any such statement

Mr. MORRELL. And that from $150,000 to $250,000 would maintain the channel open. I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio if he considers even $250,000 too large an amount to keep a channel of 35 feet open to the great city of Philadelphia?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. That is a very large amount. New York channel does not cost more than $25,000 a year.

Mr. MORRELL. I may be mistaken, but am of the opinion that the city of Philadelphia would be willing, if the channel were dredged to 35 feet, to take the maintenance of the channel off the hands of the Government.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I will remember that and I think the House will remember it, no doubt, and in some future bill avail themselves of it. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Pennsylvania may be sure that the Federal Government would have no objection to the city of Philadelphia maintaining the channel. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRELL. I think that the Federal Government has already benefited by-what shall we say?-the charity of the city of Philadelphia and the State of Pennsylvania toward Gov-

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. This question of charity is a matter of terms. Charity begins at home, and there is reason for the exercise of a lot of it on that Philadelphia channel. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRELL. I would like to ask the gentleman if the Government will agree to dredge a 35-foot channel if the city of Philadelphia will agree to maintain it?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I do not think so. I do not like to try any experiments of that kind. We had better follow some general rule.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio, chairman of the committee, a question. There is an unusual provision in the bill which authorizes the Secretary of War to lessen the depth of the Bay Ridge and Red Hook channel in New York Harbor. Will the gentleman explain that item?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Yes; there is a good deal of history in regard to that, and if I can have the time I should be glad to go into it. The bill of 1899 made provision for a 40-foot channel from New York Harbor to the sea. The Senate added an amendment against the strenuous opposition of the House conferees authorizing $3,000,000 for a 40-foot channel by Bay Ridge and Red Hook channel in New York Harbor. It is not a through channel; you can use it as a through channel, but you do not need it. The House conferees opposed it because they said it was to benefit private enterprise. The House conferees also called attention to the fact that it was illogical to dig to 40 feet, an inner channel by the wharves, long before you got the 40-foot channel to the sea. But it was insisted on, and the House conferees were told that unless it was allowed bill would fail.

What has developed? They have been working on the 40-foot channel to the sea, and it will not be finished until 1911. The contractors have failed, and they find the dredging of the channel by Red Hook and Bay Ridge very expensive, although excellent wharves have been constructed there. It will cost $1,250,000 in addition to the $3,000,000 already appropriated. The contractors have failed, or if they have not failed they have quit the work, and it seemed desirable to give this discretion to the Secretary of War to limit the depth at least for the present. There is no use for a 40-foot depth of channel by the wharves until the channel is finished to the sea, which will be four or five years.

Again, I want to say that I never favored that class of improvements. It is too much for the private benefit and too little for the general good; and yet I have been loyal to it since it has been in the bill. But independent of that it is not needed until they get the 40-foot channel to the sea.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We have it now, and the gentleman will realize that it will be impossible to ever get it again.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I do not know about that. I think the gentleman from New York, with his persuasive eloquence, could obtain it easily.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I prefer to leave the credit for obtaining where it now rests.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I do not ask the credit for it, for I have always been against it. [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. I was not here when it was obtained. But under the provision the gentleman has inserted in the bill the Secretary of War can fix the depth at any depth he pleases.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. There is no danger of his fixing it at such depth that it will not provide for the traffic there.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The fact is that these channels now run along the only available space for piers for large vessels in the harbor of New York, and it is the place that must be developed of all others.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Yes.
Mr. MANN. As to the last section of the bill, what is the purpose and what will be the effect of it?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. To enable this commission to make recommendations in regard to conditions on boundary waters between the United States and Canada. They have now jurisdiction on the Great Lakes and connecting waters.

Mr. MANN. As I understood the section from reading it, it gives this Commission the authority to report as to the diversion of all waters which lead into or are in any way tributary to any of the waters which may make the boundary line.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. That is the idea. I will say to the gentleman that when that paragraph is reached I shall probably move to strike it out and insert a much shorter section.

Mr. MANN. And I may say to the gentleman that when that paragraph is reached I shall probably reserve or make a point of order upon any provision in respect to the subject.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Forewarned is forearmed.
Mr. MANN. If it is subject to the point of order.
Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I do not think it is.

Mr. MANN. The present International Waterways Commission has undertaken to say, without ever consulting or giving a chance for people to be heard from Chicago, what shall be done with the water at Chicago. They have come into the district which I represent and have undertaken to say how we shall handle the water, and no one in that district has ever been given an opportunity to be heard by this Waterways Commission. I am not willing, if I can help it, to have any foreign body determine without a hearing what American citizens shall have.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I had understood that the board had given ample opportunity for hearing, both at Niagara Falls and in Chicago.

Mr. MANN. On the contrary, the board did go to Chicago and had a hearing, but no person in the district to be affected was notified of the hearings or appeared at the hearings or had any hearing at all or knew anything about the hearings. That is the way they have acted—without a hearing.

Mr. FITZGERALD. One other question, if the gentleman will permit. Was this item regarding the Bay Ridge and Red Hook channels inserted upon the recommendation of anyone?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. It is the recommendation of the en-

Mr. FITZGERALD. For this year? I wish to find out.
Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I would state it is a recommendation made since the report. There is a great deal in this bill that is based on recommendations and letters from local engineers transmitted through the chief. This is based on recommenda-tions made by the local engineer, indorsed by the chief. I presume I could furnish, though I do not think it is worth while, the gentleman with the correspondence upon it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would be glad to have it before we reach that part of the bill.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I think it is a good provision.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am inclined to differ with the gentleman.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. One other provision as to New York Harbor that I may mention in that connection, and that is this: The Secretary of War is given authority in the Ambrose chan-The Secretary of war is given authority in the Ambrose char-nel to limit its use to daylight navigation to boats not drawing more than 29 feet. That is with a view to preventing inter-ference with the dredgers while they are at work.

Mr. MANN. That is before it is completed.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Yes. How much more time have I,

Mr. Chairman

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I do not care for any more time. will say that if at any time any gentleman desires to ask me any questions, I will be glad to answer them. One other thing I may say, Mr. Chairman. I shall probably desire ten or fifteen minutes after the arguments on this inland waterway in which to reply, and I ask unanimous consent now that when these arguments are concluded I may have fifteen minutes' time in which to reply.

Mr. MANN. Make it half an hour.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Oh, I do not want any more than

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have an hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for one hour.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I know I am voicing the sentiments of the people not only of my own district, but of the entire Middle West, when I say that, as far as their interests are concerned, the bill which is now before us is a sad disappointment and a most painful miscarriage. As the largest river and harbor bill ever presented, it will justly be regarded by them as a monumental injustice to the Mississippi Valley, if not as an unparalleled attempt on the part of a committee to use their power for the purpose of discriminating against the people of that section and using the share of the appropriations justly belonging to them for the benefit of other sections whose interests are nearer and dearer to their hearts.

A river and harbor bill carrying $84,000,000 with the two largest rivers of the country practically left out is certainly outdoing the proverbial performance of Hamlet without the melancholy Dane. Not less that 18,000,000 of people live in the Valleys of the Mississippi and the Missouri from the head of navigation to Cairo, being nearly one-fourth of the population of the country. In all fairness they should have been allotted one-fourth of the total appropriations, because their interest in the navigation of these rivers demands it. But instead of $20,000,000 they are scornfully given just $1,050,000, namely, $500,000 for the upper Mississippi; $250,000 for that stretch which needs the attention of the Government more urgently than any other water course in the country, namely, between St. Louis and Cairo, and $300,000 for the whole of the Missouri River. The other nineteen millions which fairly belong to these rivers, according to population statistics, are frittered away on numberless rivulets and creeks, with a keen eye to businessby any means river business, but to the business of mustering sufficient votes for the passage of this bill through the House. What the Army engineers are to do with the niggardly amounts allotted to the two great rivers above Cairo is, no doubt, a co-nundrum to them as well as to us. They surely must feel as we do, that the generosity which prompted the distinguished chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee when he made those allowances must have been painfully mixed with a feeling of profound regret that these great rivers are on the map at all.

And what consideration has the chairman given to the proposed deep waterway from the Lakes to the Gulf, which the people of the Middle West are vigorously demanding as an urgent measure of relief for present conditions? None what-ever. Not one dollar is provided for that great project, not a dollar even for that part of the waterway which has already been surveyed, which the engineers have pronounced feasible, and for which $31,000,000 have been asked in all, namely, the part between Chicago and St. Louis. I shall later on discuss the reasons which have been alleged for this unparalleled slight. For the present let me say to our friends from Missouri, from Illinois, Iowa, Indiana, Kansas, Tennessee, Kentucky, and all the States along the Mississippi and the Missouri: If they are satisfied with this proposed deal, if they are willing to submit to it, then I believe they would also be content if the generous chairman of the committee had presented them with mere pictures of these rivers. And judging from the manner in which the honorable chairman has had his way, the members of the committee, with that reluctance, of course, which is born of self-respect, would have done his bidding perhaps even in the matter of giving pictures. I am bound to add, however, that no Member representing a district in the States I have mentioned will be true to the interests of his constituents who will not join hands with us in using all honorable means, parliamentary and other, to correct the errors of this bill and help substitute the judgment of the House for the judgment of the one Member of it.

I assert, Mr. Chairman, that the committee would not have dared to come here with so large a bill-the largest, as I said. ever presented in the history of the countrybut for the strong sentiment which has recently been aroused in all parts of the country in favor of internal improvements on a more comprehensive scale, and it is well known that this movement started in the Mississippi Valley and found its first organized expres sion at the great convention held in the city of St. Louis on the 16th, 17th, and 18th of last November, when 1,100 delegates, representing eight States of the Union and many millions of people, declared in favor of a systematic Mississippi River improvement and a 14-foot waterway from the Lakes to the Gulf.

The committee has not been slow in fructifying this movement by swelling the grand total of the appropriations to enormous proportions, but the people of the Mississippi Valley find that they have been made to shine other people's shoes instead of their own, and that the members of the committee have appropriated what should have been given to the two great rivers for their own pet projects. In other words, eighty-two millions are parceled out to "clean up," as they call it, old committee projects, of which the country at large knows little or nothing and which simply means that the agitation in favor of the real great national projects, projects which the people of all sections and the press alike strenuously advocate, has been cleverly utilized to complete all kinds of local schemes, while the larger improvements referred to have been entirely ignored. And when I say entirely ignored, I mean that for all practical purposes these larger projects might as well have been left out of the bill altogether.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman-

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I will.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, if it meets the gentleman's purpose, I would be glad if he would describe the method to be resorted to in order to secure this 14-foot channel. Most everybody regards that as very desirable if it is possible. I suppose it can only be done by lowering the bottom of the river or raising its surface by dams. Now, what is the process and method by which this is to be accomplished?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, as far I have conversed with engineers I have been told that in the stretch which lies between St. Louis and Cairo a sufficient depth can be secured by a contraction of the river by revetment work, riprapping, and all the methods with which the United States engineers are familiar. The Illinois River, I understand, is for the most part of its length of a sufficient depth now, and the drainage canal certainly is. The proposition has been made that a lateral canal should be constructed between St. Louis and Cairo, and I will explain in the course of my remarks what that proposition really means.

If the gentleman will permit me, he speaks Mr. HEPBURN. of the plan of narrowing the river and the use of revetment Is it intended to resume the old plan that was in vogue under the commission a few years ago, and after spending $26,000,000 upon it was abandened by them? Do you propose to revive that scheme?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, the plan was not abandoned by them. The plan of the engineers, the plan of 1881, which the gentleman mentioned, has been carried on for quite a while and with very excellent results, but gradually the Committee on Rivers and Harbors in their judgment abandoned the plan, their reason being that the traffic or tonnage along that stretch of the river did not justify the expenditures of the large amounts which would be necessary for the permanent improvement of the river.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me, I believe it was estimated that the cost of the revetment plan and the false bank which would give the river a uniform width of 40 feet would cost something like $19 a foot, and which we suppose was applied, for $26,000,000 were expended. Now, is there 1 foot of that revetment or 1 foot of that false bank now in existence?

Yes; there is, Mr. Chairman. Mr. BARTHOLDT.

Mr. HEPBURN. Not a foot.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Of course the fact is that the appropriations which have been made during the last four years, namely, $650,000 a year, which should have been spent to forward and carry out that old plan, have not been spent for that purpose at They have merely been spent, or rather they have not been spent, in toto, a large part of that money having gone back either to the Treasury or remains as an unexpended balance. The only work that has been done was dredging, and as a result of that new policy inaugurated by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, a great part of the work for which large expenditures have been made has gone to waste, as the gentleman from Iowa says. But we do not care how much it will cost. That project is important enough that it should be inaugurated by this Government and this nation.

Mr. HEPBURN. If the gentleman will permit me, I think he will find a message from President Cleveland among the documents printed by the House in which he congratulates the country upon securing an additional depth of 1 inch at the Plum Point reach and 11 inches at the New Madrid reach after the expenditure of $26,000,000.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. The sarcasm of a Democratic President with respect to a most important business question is probably responsible for the present condition of the Democratic party. Hence, Mr. Chairman, on finding that our thunder has been stolen and that our people have been treated with sovereign contempt in the committee, we appeal from the committee to the House, asking not for favors, but for simple justice on this

We are no supplicants nor are we soreheads. We do not begrudge a single dollar contained in this bill for any section or any purpose, but we are here to assert our rights by proving that we have been discriminated against and unjustly dealt with, and it is the purpose of my remarks to adduce this proof and to give good and substantial reasons why the House should support the amendments we are going to offer.

I yield to no man in high esteem of and personal regard for the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and am certain he needs no assurances from me on that We are not only colaborers in a public cause in which we both are vitally interested, but also personal friends. Though I admit, Mr. Chairman, if anywhere I have learned here that friendship usually ceases where material or sectional interests are at stake, I shall not question the gentleman's motives, nor shall I say anything which could be twisted into a personal reflection or in the least affect our personal relations. But I do find fault with the gentleman's judgment, and I do propose to criticise his official action, and because we plainly see in this action a discrimination against our section, it is quite natural that we should endeavor to ascertain the reasons for such discrimination, and then candidly inform the House of the result of our research.

There can be no other upright explanation of the treatment accorded to my people than that the gentleman from Ohio honestly believes in maintaining the present course of our commerce, namely, west to east via the Great Lakes. It is evident to him and to all that to divert part of this commerce in another direction, namely, from north to south, would involve a corresponding loss not only to the lake transportation interests, but also to the eastern railroad corporations. We know that the improvement of the Mississippi River and its large tributaries is deeply feared by the interests connected with the eastern outlet from the Lakes, and we unsophisticated Westerners must be pardoned when in the simplicity of our minds we regard the slight we are to suffer at the hands of the committee as positive proof of the fact that the committee has been largely controlled by that fear. It is a committee combination of the East and South against the Middle West that confronts us in this bill. True, one Mississippi Valley man is on the committee—I refer to the distinguished gentleman from Louisiana—and sure enough he gets three or four million dollars for the lower river, but you must remember that this liberal allowance is not spent so much for navigation as it is for levee and bank protection, and hence will not hurt the interests to which I have called atten-And there appears to be another reason for this liberality toward the lower river, as we shall see instantly.

I said there is no other explanation for leaving us out in the cold than that the committee, or rather its chairman, honestly believes in encouraging the whole traffic to continue to go west to east instead of starting part of it from north to south. Let me correct this statement by saying that our people believe to have discovered another plausible reason for the treatment accorded them. This explanation, however, presupposes that the chairman was actuated by motives of sectional partiality, and I do not care to make such a charge against anyone. theless I feel it my duty to mention this matter, contenting myself with a statement of facts and leaving it to the judgment of the House to say whether these facts are entitled to serious consideration or not. I hold in my hand a copy of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, a conservative and high-toned newspaper, and one of the largest in the country, which contains a map of a proposed canal from the city of Cleveland, on Lake Erie, to Pitts burg, and a description in which it is pointed out that this canal will be the connecting link of a new waterway to the Gulf, namely, from Pittsburg through the Ohio River to Cairo and thence down the Mississippi to the Gulf. "The map shows," runs the account, "the projected canal between Lake Erie and the Ohio River. This canal was surveyed by engineers of the War Department some years ago, and the franchise to build it has been granted by Congress to a private company—a most unusual thing.

Mr. DAVIDSON. Is the canal he refers to the one that is to be built by private parties?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I am coming to that.
Mr. DAVIDSON. From Ashtabula to Pittsburg?
Mr. BARTHOLDT. Yes, sir. What I have just quoted, Mr. Chairman, is followed by a statement jointly made by William K. Kavanaugh, president of the Lakes-to-the-Gulf Deep Waterway Association, and James E. Smith, president of the St. Louis Business Men's League, part of which I ask the Clerk to read and for which I crave the attention of the House. It is in part as follows

Mr. DALZELL. May I interrupt the gentleman a moment? Mr. BARTHOLDT. Certainly.

Mr. DALZELL. I want to correct the gentleman. The canal I see marked on the map there, and for which a franchise was given to private individuals, is not to be built pursuant to any Government survey. It is being built pursuant to a survey by a commission appointed by the State of Pennsylvania in the first instance, and subsequently by the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Pittsburg.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. For the purpose of my argument it is im-material who made the survey. The canal is there.

Mr. DALZELL. I do not know why the gentleman should have connected the Government with it.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I did not do it. I quoted from a newspaper which stated that the Government had made the survey.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

The plan in the mind of Chairman Burron seems to be to make the Ohio River the trade highway from the Lakes to the Gulf, and by refusing to make the Mississippl River above Cairo navigable and refusing sufficient help for the Missouri River he will entirely destroy the usefulness of those two waterways above the junction with the Ohio. Then, building the projected canal between Lake Erie and the Ohio River, the trade of the Lakes will go to Cleveland, the home of Chairman Burron, by the canal down the Ohio and the lower Mississippi to the Gulf. Thus Cleveland and Pittsburg will be built up at the expense of Chicago, and the present trade adjustments will be radically changed.

We submit to the Members of Congress and to the people of the Mississippi Valley that the chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee has no right to nourish the trade of his own section at the expense of another, and this map, we think, plainly shows the effect of what he is trying to do, whether or not he has the motive. We are quite willing that the Lakes should have an outlet through the Ohio River to the Gulf, even though the traffic has to go through a canal owned by a company which will charge toll; but the other outlet from the Lakes by Lake Michigan and Chicago through the Lakes-to-the-Gulf deep waterway should also be opened.

We believe that Chairman Burton is using the power which has been placed in his hands unfairly and to the commercial injury of the people of Illinois, Missouri, Minnesota, Wisconsin, North and South Dakota, Iowa. Montana, Nebraska, and Kansas, which States would profit largely by having a water highway from Lake Michigan to the Gulf, from St. Paul to the Gulf, and from Sioux City to the Gulf. If Chairman Burton's appropriations can be taken as evidence of a carefully laid plan, it will mean that he intends to deprive the States which have been named entirely of the benefit of water transportation and to use his power to make Cleveland the eastern end of a Lakes-to-the-Gulf wate

Mr. BISHOP. Will the gentleman yield to me?
Mr. BARTHOLDT. If I can have my time extended.
Mr. BISHOP. I simply wanted to know if the gentleman adopted that article and indorsed its sentiments,

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I am coming to that.

Now, what are the facts, Mr. Chairman? Is there anything in the bill which could be construed as bearing out the assertion that the committee, upon the dictation of its chairman, is favoring another outlet to the Gulf at the expense of the Mississippi Valley? The answer to this question is an emphatic "Yes!" It is a fact that at the last session of Congress a bill was passed authorizing a private company to construct a canal from Lake Erie to Pittsburg, and we of the Mississippi Valley were generous enough to vote for it in spite of the serious objection that this work was to be undertaken by a private corporation instead of by the Government. We did it because it signified a great improvement for the carrying of freight and the regulation of Had we been selfish, had our feelings been sec railroad rates. tional, we should have opposed the measure. We certainly did not dream that this scheme would be seized upon by the committee as a club to smite us with. On the contrary, we expected the men interested in that waterway to stand by us in the enforcement of our legitimate demands as we stood by them, and we expect them to do so now. Of course the bill carries no appropriation for that canal, because it is a private enterprise. But let us go further. In order to provide for this new waterway to the Gulf it is necessary to improve the Ohio River from Pittsburg to Cairo. Does the bill make provision for that? Of course it does. The Ohio gets more than ever be-fore, namely, $1,273,966 for locks and dams, some of the appro-priations for which having been made continuous for two or three years, and $450,000 for general improvement. This brings us to Cairo, where we strike the lower Mississippi, and here is where the liberal appropriations for this river begin, namely, $3,000,000 from Cairo to the head of the passes, and $1,050,000 Thus we have a new water route from for the Southwest Pass. Cleveland and Lake Erie to the Gulf, leaving us high and dry. Quod erat demonstrandum!

I say again, Mr. Chairman, that we approve, aye, rejoice in, all tempt to ignore the vital interests of a vast and important part of the United States and of its progressive population, and appeal to those who are interested in seeing this bill become a law to stand up with us for equal justice to all. Whatever may have been the reasons which prompted the committee to treat us as they did, the fact is that our just demands have been ignored to such an extent as to make this bill appear to our section in the light of a punitive measure.

At a recent meeting of the Business Men's League of St. Louis, the largest commercial organization of the West, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That the Business Men's League respectfully requests that the Congressmen from St. Louis, when the rivers and harbors bill is reported, introduce two amendments to it.

First, an amendment making an appropriation for $1,000,000 a year for four years for the permanent improvement of the Mississippi River between St. Louis and Cairo, to continue the plan of 1881.

Second, an appropriation of $3,000,000 to begin work on the deep waterway from the Lakes to the Gulf.

Resolved, That the Business Men's League requests all representatives in Congress who desire the commercial prosperity of the Mississippi Valley to yote and work for these two amendments.

The two amendments referred to in these resolutions will be introduced at the proper time; and if I can have the attention of the House, I shall proceed to give my reasons why they should be adopted.

For the purposes of my argument it is immaterial why the distinguished chairman of the committee is opposed to the permanent improvement of the Mississippi River and to the deep waterway to the Gulf; hence I shall not inquire further into that question. For the Members of the House it will be suffi-cient to know that he is opposed to both propositions, and he was candid enough to say so on several occasions. To impair our standing with the committee the first thing that was done was the promulgation of a new rule, which in the report to this bill is called "a radical departure from former methods" and explained in the following language:

It has been thought best to undertake no new improvement unless the whole amount required for its completion, whether the projects involve large or small expense, is appropriated or authorized.

This barred at the outset the deep waterway from the Lakes to the Gulf, because, without a simultaneous bond issue, no river and harbor bill could be made large enough to carry the total amounts required for the completion of this gigantic project. Our plea that at least a start be made between Chicago and St. Louis, the stretch which has already been surveyed and estimated, was met by a reference to that new rule, which, by the way, if adhered to in the future will keep us out of court forever, unless, as I said, bonds are issued to carry out our great project. And when we argued that the stretch between St. Louis and Cairo would have to be improved, no matter whether the deep waterway would ever become a reality or not, and consequently a sufficient appropriation should be made at least for that part of the river, we were told that for the purposes of the deep waterway a canal might have to be constructed par-alleling the Mississippi along that stretch, so that any money spent for the river would be practically thrown away.

Thus the Lakes-to-the-Gulf project was used as a handy trump against the demands for river improvement. When we pressed for such improvement, aside from that project, we were answered that the present tonnage on the Mississippi did not justify an adherence to the engineers' plans of 1881 for permanent improvement, while, on the other hand, when we emphasized the importance of the deep waterway to the Gulf the reply was that no survey had yet been made from St. Louis to New Orleans. All the way through the chairman played fast and loose with us, until our patience was exhausted. I tell you this story merely to show that reasons are as cheap as berries when you want to turn a thing down, and how easy it is to make a new rule when the reasons do not hold out.

But let me examine the chairman's objections a little more closely. In 1881 the United States engineers reported in favor of a plan for the permanent improvement of the Mississippi River between St. Louis and Cairo, which contemplated a contraction of the river by revetment, riprapping, etc. That plan was adhered to for a while, but afterwards abandoned, and up to this day no valid reason has been advanced why it was abandoned. Good results had followed the work of systematic improvement, and no special engineering difficulties had been encountered; but in spite of all that, and in spite of my protests and those of others, the work to secure a permanent channel was practically stopped and the temporary expedient of dredging resorted to, so that for the last few years a large part of the money actually appropriated remained un-expended. And that was before the proposition of "14 feet through the valley" was advanced; consequently the new thethese appropriations and would not lend a hand in reducing through the valley" was advanced; consequently the new theorem even for our own benefit, but we protest against the atory of a lateral canal along our stretch of the river could not have affected the policy of the committee at the time of which I speak. Hence we can not explain this change of plan except on the theory of a studied neglect and deliberate disregard of our interests. If we are to understand that permanent improvement is impossible in the case of the largest river of the country, then we might as well quit the river improvement business altogether and admit that other governments can accomplish more and achieve better results in that line than we can.

But, says the gentleman from Ohio, your tonnage shows that you have not made use of the water you have. Our answer to that is that no capitalist can be induced to go into the river transportation business when he is told that the Government has practically abandoned its plans of permanent improvement. One word flashed across the wires to-day would revive our river traffic, but this bill will wipe out what was left of it. claim that commerce will follow the improvement of a river just as it follows the construction of a railroad. And right here let me remind the House of the fact that the committee "Some streams," says the report, itself believes in this theory. "in which no considerable traffic has yet developed are appropriated for, with the expectation that traffic may follow the improvement." If this is true in other parts of the country, why not in ours? Is there a man within the sound of my voice who would deny, if we had a permanent channel of 14 feet, or even 12 or 10 feet, that we would not have the freight or the bottoms to carry it in? It is true railroad rates to the Gulf are reasonable; they are even low; but if this is the effect of the mere existence of the river, what would be the result of actual competition between the waterway and railroads? I do not propose to quote figures, but surely millions and millions would be saved annually to both the producers and consumers of the products of the West and Northwest, aye, more than ten times the interest on any investment the Government would make in the improvement of these great natural highways traversing our continent from north to south. "River regulation is rate regulation!

The suspension of the work to secure a channel of sufficient depth between St. Louis and Cairo is being justified, as I stated before, on the plea that a canal might have to be built. Bearing on this point, let me read to you part of a letter I have received from the Business Men's League of St. Louis. It is as follows:

Chairman Burton has influenced a great many newspaper men and a great many others by stating that the reason why he did not favor an immediate appropriation for the deep waterway was that engineers believed that a canal from St. Louis down should be a lateral canal and not in the river. He has always intimated that this suggestion came to him from United States engineers. We have made it a point to investigate this, and we find that the United States engineers absolutely deny ever having had any such idea and disclaim having made any such suggestion to Mr. Burton. The engineers, indeed are very anxious to have Mr. Burton declare from whom he got the suggestion, and we think it is important to ask him the question directly on the floor, because he has used the statement with very great force on some people.

Upon the strength of this letter I ask the gentleman from Ohio who his official authority is for the suggestion that a canal paralleling the river will be necessary?

Mr. DAVIDSON. In the absence of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Burton] I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri if the board of engineers of the Mississippi Canal Commission, reporting on the deep waterway projected from the mouth of the Ohio River to the city of St. Louis, did not recommend the proposition that a lateral canal would be the only feasible way in which a 14-foot channel could be maintained below the mouth of the Missouri?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. My friend from Wisconsin refers to the engineers' report, which was in favor of the deep water between Chicago and St. Louis, and in that report it is stated that a canal might be necessary between Alton and St. Louis, a distance of 14 miles. We here refer to the stretch between St. Louis and Cairo, and not to what the gentleman from Wisconsin called attention to. I am sorry the distinguished chairman of the committee is not present to answer this question, and I shall take occasion to ask it again when the bill is under consideration under the five-minute rule.

We in St. Louis have never heard of such a thing as a canal paralleling the river. On the contrary, all the Army engineers I have talked with on the subject seemed to agree that by proper contraction of the river a channel deep enough for the purposes of the waterway may be secured, and if it could not, surely we would have every reason to despair of what nobody ever doubted—the skill and ingenuity of our American engineers. Right here let me suggest, however, that Missouri River regulation should go hand in hand with the improvement of the Mississippi in order to stop the farm lands along the Missouri from being swept into the Mississippi and from choking up the channel. I might as well say it right out, that the people in our section of the country regard this canal business as a subterfuge to appease the conscience of the committee and a disingenuous excuse for the denial of their rights.

And now I should like to ask some other questions which the gentleman from Ohio may answer in his own time, namely, these: If he is opposed to our deep waterway project, why provide for a survey? If the project is infeasible-and this is the only possible ground of honest opposition—why spend even $190,000 on it? But if there is doubt regarding its infeasibility, why oppose it outright? Or if he does not believe in its realization, why should the river interests be made to suffer and the work of permanent improvement be stopped where such work is more necessary than anywhere else in the country? The only logical answer to these questions I can read in this bill is that the chairman of the committee knows in his heart this project is going to be carried out, that the people will surely have their way, but just at this time he needed the available money for other purposes. No such advice was given us, for obvious reasons, but the new rules of the committee are eloquent enough on this point. First it was said that no new projects at all would be considered; but it seems that must have interfered with some other pet schemes; hence the rule was changed to read that only such new improvements should be undertaken which could be completed with the amounts appropriated or authorized in the There are more ways than one, you see, to turn people down. And "a poor rule that doesn't work both ways," for while it was enforced against us, it was not applied in other cases, for instance, in the case of the Ohio, for which $450,000 allowed for general improvement, while in reality ten times that amount would be insufficient to complete the improvement.

But enough of these inconsistencies. I allude to them merely to show that the Members of the House will no more violate a rule by supporting our propositions than the members of the committee have done themselves. What does this new arbitrary committee rule mean? It means that the three greatest projects of river improvement now before the country-the deep waterway to the Gulf and the securing of channels in the Mississippi and Missouri—will never be carried out. The enforcement of that rule would bar them permanently, because there never will be a river and harbor bill carrying sufficient appropriations at one time to provide for their completion. Under this shrewd arrangement, which seems to be especially aimed at us, this generation and the next will go down into their graves before ground will ever be broken for these great undertakings. Hence there is but one alternative. Either this rule is changed or broken by providing for these improvements on the installment plan—and this is what we propose now—or bonds must be issued to secure enough money for their com-The millions of people whose vital interests are at pletion. stake in this matter can not be told to stand aside indefinitely, and are bound to insist on either the one course or the other being pursued. Since the proposition of a bond issue for genwaterway improvements, as embodied in the bill I have had the honor to introduce, was first made, thousands of letters have been received approving the scheme, and all the editorial expressions of newspapers which I have seen were in favor of it. The fact is, the people have already waited too long and too patiently for these improvements, and—mark the prediction—if this Congress should fail to inaugurate them, they will elect a Congress which will.

We do not antagonize this bill, Mr. Chairman. Our plea is for simple justice for ourselves and for these 20,000,000 people, the producers of the Middle West, and on their behalf we appeal to the Members of this House, irrespective of party and section, to support us as we will in turn support them. That the great waterway from the Lakes to the Gulf is a commercial necessity is admitted by all the people from Florida to Oregon and from Maine to California, and when you look at the map you actually wonder why an outlet south from the great West and Northwest was not the very first great project undertaken when the policy of internal improvements of this kind was entered upon many years ago. To-day there is a demand for this improvement which resembles a popular uprising, and a failure to respond to the people's wishes is bound to be resented by them. The Middle West is suffering more than any other section from the congestion now prevailing on our railroads, and this serious condition is causing untold losses to our merchants, manufacturers, and This condition will naturally grow worse as our consumers. commerce grows and our population increases. The improvement we ask for would remedy this evil and prevent its recurrence in the future. There are those who advocate the Government ownership of railroads as a means of bringing about a satisfactory solution of this problem. But why should our Government want to own the railroads when it already owns and controls the greatest free highways of transportation ever given by an all-wise Providence to any people on earth which it can develop and use by the expenditure of a pittance as compared to the cost of acquiring the great railway systems of the country? We are building the Panama Canal, a great and magnificent undertaking which we are about to carry out for the benefit of the whole world; but great and important as this great undertaking is, its probable benefits, measured by the profit it will bring to the people of our country, are insignificant as compared with those that would follow the completion of the Lakesto-the-Gulf project and the permanent improvement of the Mississippi and Missouri rivers. Will the Members of this House as the servants of the people go on record as saying that the millions who to-day are vigorously demanding these internal improvements are wrong and the few men who have so far passed judgment on them are right? Remember what history teaches us, namely, that the instincts of the masses usually point to the wisest course; and remember also that the section mostly concerned in this question is the one which, in a political sense, decides the fate of parties and of men. Do not let us disappoint the people in their just expectations of a new era of internal improvements, and if an overflowing Treasury should not be sufficient to satisfy their demands, I say, again, let us issue bonds to carry out the great projects which will contribute more than any other factor to the continued prosperity of our common country. [Applause.]

pose to discuss the bill under consideration, but the general question of waterway improvements. I will try to show:

First. That our policy of water improvement in the past has been illiberal, insufficient, and unbusinesslike in the extreme.

Second. That it is the duty of the Government to improve its navigable waters, as it alone has authority and control over them, and that as a business proposition it would pay to improve them and make them great freight carriers and rate regu-

It is hardly necessary to discuss the first of these questions. During our entire history as a nation the total expenditures for our rivers and harbors-all our waterways of every sort, including those in far-away Hawaii-amount to about $523,-Now, this may sound like a large sum to the unthinking, but let us make a comparison. During the five years ending June 30, 1907, our total expenditures for all purposes of government have averaged $806,925,839.59 a year, of which sum rivers and harbors received $23,425,121.30 a year, or less than

3 per cent of the whole. During this five-year period fortifications received $6,761,489 a year, nearly 1 per cent of the whole; the Army received $80,509,481 a year, about 10 per cent of the whole; the Navy received $98,039,942 a year, about 12 per cent of the whole, and pensions received $140,857,836 a year, about 17 per cent of the whole. War and its rewards have for the past five years received every year more than 40 per cent of our total appropriations. Rivers and harbors received for the benefit of commerce—and bear in mind that commerce contributes practically all of our revenues-less than 3 per cent, while our Army in these piping times of peace got over 10 per cent; our Navy over 12 per cent, and our old veterans over 17 per cent. have not one word to say against the Army or the Navy, and especially against the Navy. My heart swells with a just pride when I recall the great and glorious record of our Navy without one stain upon its fair escutcheon from the days of John Paul Jones and his Bonhomme Richard to those of Dewey, Sampson, and Schley. [Applause.] And God knows I have nothing but kind thoughts and kind words for the gallant veterans of our But can any fair-minded man say that 3 per cent of all our revenues is a square deal for our rivers and harbers? that this pitiful sum is all we would receive for them? the Navy has received within the last five years a total of $490,-199,713; almost as much in five years as rivers and harbors

But it may be argued that this 3 per cent is sufficient. Not b, by any means. The river and harbor projects now pending so, by any means, before Congress with the approval of the Board of Engineers would cost fully $500,000,000, and other projects are being discussed and urged which will increase that sum. Now, if we ignore future projects and consider only those requiring $500,-000,000, and which are already approved and pressing, you see how impossible it is to provide promptly for same out of an appropriation of $23,000,000 a year. It is an impossibility, and mention two or three of them. We undertook to improve the Harlem River in New York City, within the shadow of Wall street, in 1878, twenty-eight years ago, on a plan estimated to cost $2,700,000. During those twenty-eight years about $1.350. 000 have been spent, and the work is only about one-half finished. The commerce on the Harlem River last year was 9,998,021 tons, valued at $270,210,309. At the present rate of appropriation it will require another twenty-eight years to complete this project.

About twenty-two years ago we began a project for 6-foot slack-water navigation on the Warrior and Tombigbee rivers in Alabama to connect with as rich coal mines as there are on earth and supply cheap coal to the whole Gulf coast, to our Navy, and to the great ocean fleet of that section. At first the project was estimated to cost $3,000,000, but subsequently the plan was changed and the estimated cost increased to $6,000,000. After twenty-two years it still remains far from completion.

In 1875-76, some thirty-one years ago, a project providing for 6-foot slack-water navigation on the Ohio was work begun thereon. It has proceeded with a snail's pace. Out of fifty-two locks and dams provided for in this project only six have been completed and four others are in process of con-The project has been changed to a 9-foot depth struction. instead of 6, and the estimated cost of completion is $63,000,000. If this gigantic and most meritorious work is continued at the same rate as for the past thirty years, it will not be finished by the close of this century. It is true that a little better progress has been made during the past seven years, and at the present rate we may hope to see the Ohio canalized in about fifty years

These are striking examples of the extreme slowness and unbusinesslike way in which river and harbor works have been It was not the fault of the Rivers and Harbors Committee. We have done as well as we could with the limited amounts at our disposal. Public sentiment did not seem to be with us in the past, and we could not provide the large sums necessary to push meritorious works to speedy completion. And yet the clamor from many communities was so great that we could not avoid making partial appropriations for prosecution of projects which could not be entirely finished, although we realized how much wiser it would have been to confine our efforts to fewer works and finish them as we went along. This policy of completing old projects before undertaking new ones has, to a great extent; been applied in the pending bill, and it is much wiser.

There are two entirely separate and distinct kinds of waterway improvements-one, the harbors on our Great Lakes and seacoasts, including those near the mouths of our great rivers and connecting channels on the Lakes; and the other, our interior rivers and canals and connecting channels along our seacoasts. Appropriations have been fairly liberal for most of our great harbors such as Duluth, Milwaukee, Chicago, Cleveland, and Buffalo, on the Lakes; Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Norfolk, and Savannah, on the Atlantic; Pensacola, New Orleans, Mobile, and Galveston, on the Gulf; San Francisco, Portland, and Seattle on the Pacific. These harbors are the terminals for ships of deep draft, which carry our commerce on the Lakes and seas, and they are also railroad terminals. At these harbors railroads and ships exchange loads, the ships taking on the railroad freight destined for home or for foreign consumption and giving in return their cargo for distribution in the interior. There is a very intimate connection and strong mutuality of interest between these harbors and railroads. The harbor is anxious to have a great number of railroads unloading at its wharves, and the railroads desire the deepest harbors in order that they may connect with the largest and best ships affoat, which can give and receive great quantities of freight and handle same at the minimum of cost. It follows, therefore, that the powerful railroad corporations throughout the country are strong supporters of appropriations made in the interest of harbors.

The case is quite different in regard to the improvement of rivers and internal waters, and for most of them appropriations have been entirely inadequate. For a long time it was thought that not only was there no mutuality of interest between river and rail, but an actual rivalry and antagonism between them. It was believed that as water rates are so much cheaper than rail the improvement of rivers would reduce rail rates below the point of profit, and that vast quantities of freight would move by water. Hence there was little or no support given by railroads to river improvements. But a change has come over the spirit of railroads, and in some striking instances they have actually assisted river and canal improvements.

Some of our most worthy projects have been under way for a great many years and are still far from completion. Let me of the column of the taxpayers of New York had submitted to them a bond issue of $101,000,000 for the enlargement of the Eric Canal so as to carry boats of from 1,000 to 1,500 tons burden, and although the New York Central Railroad is the largest taxpayer in the State, it voted for and supported that bond issue, taking the ground that the improvement of the Eric Canal would cause such a great influx of people into the State along its banks and so many additional manufacturing enterprises that the business of the road in the carriage of passengers and high-class freights would be very much augmented, and the road would profit thereby, although the canal would carry the low-class freight at a much reduced rate.

During recent years the best friends of national aid to the Mississippi River between Cairo and the Gulf have been the Illinois Central and the Missouri Pacific railroads, and now we find Mr. James J. Hill, of the Great Northern, strongly urging that the Mississippi be deepened to 15 feet from St. Louis to the Gulf.

In my judgment rivers and railroads should not be rivals, but friends and mutual helpers, just as railroads and harbors have helped each other. Rivers should carry heavy freights, such as coal, structural iron and steel, lumber, grain, cotton, etc., thereby relieving the railroads and preventing congestion, while the railroads should carry lighter and higher class freights, which command higher rates, and also passengers. Well-improved rivers and cheap rates would cause a rapid increase of population and manufactures and, as a resultant, more business for both the river and the railroad.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Certainly. Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. If it does not interfere with the harmony of the gentleman's remarks, I wish he would dilate a little more on the proposition as to whether or not it is the policy of the railroads in this country to facilitate the development of the waterways, or whether their policy, as a general proposition, is antagonistic to that development.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. I am inclined to think that at the present time they would like to facilitate it. That has not been their policy in the past. When we had sparsely settled communities, when there was not sufficient freight for both waterways and railroads, I think they were opposed to the development of the waterway. But the tremendous growth of population and the very rapid growth of business of every kind has changed conditions, and I believe now, sir, they would be very glad to see these waterways improved.

This brings me to my second proposition—that it is the duty of the Government to improve its navigable waters, as it alone has authority and control over them, and that as a business proposition it would pay to improve them and make them great freight carriers and rate regulators, thereby adding greatly to the national prosperity.

Waterways are needed to carry freights and relieve the terrible congestion which now exists all over the Union, and they are needed to control and cheapen railroad rates.

According to Mr. James J. Hill, president of the Great Northern Railway, in his testimony before Interstate Commerce Commissioners Lane and Harlan December 17, 18, and 19, 1906, in Minneapolis, the business of the country increased 110 per cent from 1895 to 1905 and transportation facilities for handling same increased only 20 per cent during that time. He says we need at least 73,333 miles of new railroad to relieve the congestion, which would cost fully $5,500,000,000, and that sum is more money than we can possibly raise. "That is the stone wall we are up against, and foresight does not look forward far enough to get a glance of it. We are up against it until it is President Elliot, of the Northern Pacific, says that in attempting to handle the freight offered they (the railroads) were trying to "force a 3-inch stream through a 1-inch nozzle," and Mr. Hill declared that his road, as well as many others, "was endeavoring to bore a 1-inch hole with a 1-inch auger."

All the testimony before these commissioners showed great freight congestion in every part of the country investigated by

"Fifty million bushels of grain, as nearly as can be estimated, remain on the farms or in the country elevators of North Dakota—only 38 per cent of the crop has been shipped. Thousands of bushels of wheat are lying at this time (December 19, 1906) covered with snow in open bins built beside the railroad track. The farmer can not sell because the country dealer can not buy; the country dealer can not buy because the country elevator is already full. The country elevator remains full because the railroad has not moved the grain from the country elevator to the terminal elevator. The terminal ele-vators at Duluth, Superior, and Minneapolis, which act as great reservoirs for the line elevators, are almost empty, and at no time during the season have they been filled to more than one-third of their capacity."

Please bear in mind that Duluth, Superior, and Minneapolis, where the elevators are almost empty, are all on navigable waterways.

"This unfortunate chain of conditions has involved financial loss to not an inconsiderable percentage of the population of the It is a loss which begins with the farmer, but also includes the merchant, grain dealer, elevator man, the miller, and the railroad. And such loss is to be reckoned in figures computed on the basis of the reduced price upon millions of bushels of grain, for every bushel of which there is demand. The farmer has been compelled to ask the merchant to extend his credit. The merchant, the elevator man, and the country dealer have been forced to secure new and unusual loans at the The dealer who sold grain for November delivery has failed to keep his contract and has incurred a loss. and insurance have eaten away the profits of the dealers, and the price of grain has fallen from 2 to 6 cents per bushel at quite a number of country points."

The situation in the Northwest is indicative of the true situation in every part of the country. I was told on November 15 last by a prominent shipper of flaxseed from Chicago that he had tried to contract for the shipment of 500,000 bushels of that cereal to New York about the 1st of November, and the earliest delivery promised him was the 10th of January. Indeed, he was warned that it would be unsafe to contract for tide-water delivery before the latter part of January, by which date the Argentine flaxseed would be in the market and the price reduced 3 cents per bushel, and at the same time all other grain dealers had a similar warning not to make contracts for delivery before the last of January, 1907.

The president of the Oregon Lumbermen's Association told me on the 7th of last December that the congestion at the mills of Oregon and Washington was so great that his own firmof the largest in the West-had been unable to fill orders which had been on their books for a year. He also said that if the congestion for the next year remains as bad as during the past year he fears that a number of the thoroughly responsible lumbermilling firms of the Pacific coast will be compelled to go into bankruptcy simply and solely because of inability to ship their products, which are in active demand and would readily sell if delivery could be made.

A prominent official of the National Harvester Company, of Chicago, one of the largest and wealthiest corporations in the United States, which manufactures vast quantities of harvesting machinery of all kinds, told me about the middle of November last that his firm had contracted in January, 1906, for a large ware-house in North Dakota and had agreed to furnish to the contractor the heavy timbers for same, which could be obtained only from the Pacific coast. He said that, in spite of their utmost exertions to obtain that lumber, delivery was delayed for many months, and that his firm would be lucky if it escaped by the payment of $5,000 damages to the contractors because of failure to furnish the lumber as agreed. Examples might be multiplied if necessary, but everyone admits that there is great freight congestion everywhere; hence I deem it unnecessary to pursue this discussion further.

Now, what can we do to relieve the situation? Mr. Hill tells us that it will take 73,333 miles of railroad, which will cost $5,500,000,000, and says that the United States is unable to raise that sum. I presume that no one will seriously insist that it is the duty of the Government to go into the business of constructing railroads at this time, and all that we can do in that line, I take it, is to encourage the present railroad corporations to extend their lines as rapidly as possible. But there is one form of transportation in which we can help. In 1796 Congress passed an act declaring navigable rivers to be public highways. No State or community can interfere with the free use of navigable waters; and as the Government owns them and controls them, it is its duty to improve them as much and as rapidly as possible.

Even Mr. Hill, the able president of the Great Northern Railroad, is a strong advocate of water improvements. On the 6th of December last, during the session of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, he wired me as follows:

Hon. Joseph E. Ransdell, 'National Rivers and Harbors Congress, Washington, D. C.:

I deeply regret my inability to attend the National Rivers and Harbors Congress. In view of the inability of the railways to move the heavier classes of tonnage in the entire country, there has been no subject before Congress in twenty years which interests so many people and will prove so great a benefit to the entire basin of the Mississippi and Missouri rivers as a 15-foot channel or canal from St. Louis to the Gulf of Mexico.

Now, I agree most heartily with Mr. Hill, and nothing would please me better than to see this great project adopted and pushed to rapid completion. But surely every argument Mr. Hill can advance that it is the duty of the Government to improve the Mississippi River to a depth of 15 feet from St. Louis to the Gulf can be used in the support of the improvement of a great many other rivers in the land. If the deepening of the Mississippi from St. Louis to its mouth would be as beneficial to the Mississippi and Missouri valleys, as suggested by Mr. Hill, why not extend this great waterway to Chicago through the Illinois River, thereby connecting with an endless chain of water the matchless system of our Great Lakes and their tributary rivers and canals with the 16,000 navigable miles of the "Father of Waters" and his tributaries—the finest rivers in the world; thereby connecting our great island seas and their many large and wealthy cities with the Gulf of Mexico, the Panama Canal, and the Orient by the best and shortest water route? This idea of connecting the Lakes with the Mississippi River and the Gulf is one of the greatest and wisest conceptions of the age, fully as important, in my judgment, to the American people as the Panama Canal itself, and I carnestly hope that the commission of engineers created by this bill to survey that part of the route south of St. Louis will encounter no insurmountable difficulties.

If Mr. Hill is right and deep rivers are needed to relieve freight congestion, why not improve the great Missouri River, which the engineers tell us is navigable up to Fort Benton, Mont., 2,285 miles from its mouth, thereby relieving the appalling congestion in North Dakota and Montana which now exists, and carrying invaluable benefits to all the citizens of its imperial valley? Why not give the upper Mississippi at least 6 feet of water up to Mr. Hill's home in St. Paul? If Mr. Hill is right about the lower Mississippi, would not the situation be relieved by improving the Ohio River to a depth of 9 feet from Pittsburg to Cairo-a distance of 1,000 miles through the greatest freight-producing section of the Union, and the most populous and prosperous river valley on our continent? Why would not the congestion in Tennessee and northern Alabama be relieved by improving the Cumberland and Tennessee rivers, which are splendid streams, susceptible of first-class navigation for many hundreds of miles? Why would it not relieve the congestion in the new State of Oklahoma, in Arkansas, in northern Texas, and Louisiana if we properly improve the Arkansas, the Red, and the Ouachita rivers? Why not sas, in northern Texas, and Louisiana it we properly many the Arkansas, the Red, and the Ouachita rivers? Why not help along the people of Mississippi by improving the Yazoo and the Big Sunflower; those of Alabama and Georgia by deepening the Black Warrior and the Chattahoochee; those of Texas by canalizing the Brazos and the Trinity; those in eastern Georgia and South Carolina by improvement on the Savannah and the Santee; those in North Carolina and Virginia by proper expenditures on the Cape Fear, the James, and the canal from Norfolk to Beaufort; those in Pennsylvania and New Jersey by improving the Allegheny, the Youghlogheny, the Delaware, and the Passaic; those in New York and in the Eastern States by cooperating with the Empire State to make its great Erie Canal of the greatest utility, and by canalizing the Connecticut River?

Why not improve the mighty Columbia River of the West and give to the people of that vast region relief from their great freight congestion? Why not canalize the beautiful and historic Willamette? Why not apply to the Sacramento and San Joaquin the same policy of improvement which Mr. Hill urges for the Mississippi? If it be the duty of Uncle Sam to improve the Mississippi—and I quite agree with Mr. Hill that it is not only his duty, but the part of wisdom to do so—surely it is his duty to improve all of these other streams as well, together with many others I have not mentioned. The people on their banks are his children and entitled to his aid and assistance just as much as those who live on the banks of the Mississippi, and they need relief from freight congestion just as much relatively as the people of the Mississippi Valley.

But would it pay to make these improvements? Yes, I say; it would pay beyond the shadow of a doubt; it would pay better than any investment this Government ever made. Why do I say this? I say it because it is a fact established beyond dispute that water transportation costs on an average in this country only one-sixth as much as transportation by rail, and whenever waterways are thoroughly improved not only does a large quantity of freight move thereon at rates only one-sixth as high as those by rail, but the rates on competing railroads are very materially reduced, and for every dollar of the people's money invested by Congress annually in the improvement of our waterways at least two dollars a year are saved to the people in reduced rates.

The most striking instance of water transportation in this country on which we have accurate statistics is that through the Sault Ste. Marie Canal between Lake Superior and Lake Huron. According to Col. Charles E. L. B. Davis, United States engineer in charge of the work at that place, the total commerce passing through the locks in 1905 was 44,270,680 tons, which was carried an average distance of 833.3 miles at a cost per ton per mile of 0.85 of a mill, making a total of $31,420,584. It is estimated that the freight passing through the "Soo" during the year 1906 was over 52,000,000 tons, but I have no accurate statistics thereon. The average freight charge per ton per mile on the railroads of the Union during 1905 was 7.6 miles, which is about nine times as great as the rate on Lakes. Now, if we assume that this great freight of 44,270,000 tons had been carried, not at the average rail rate of 7.6 mills per mile, but at 5.1 mills, which is six times the water rate, the freight charge thereon would have been more than $187,000,000, instead of the price actually paid, which was $31,000,000. Hence the saving on that amount of freight was about $156,000,000. It should be borne in mind also that there is a vast commerce on the Lakes which does not pass through the "Soo," and it is all moved at rates relatively the same, or 0.85 of 1 mill per ton per mile. The total cost of improvements on the Lakes is about $70,000,000, and the saving on the commerce through the "Soo" alone in one year (1905) was nearly two and a half times as much as this total cost of all our improvements on the entire lake system. Surely that was a wise expenditure of money,

Let me cite another instance of lake and rail rates. Between Pittsburg and the harbors of Conneaut and Ashtabula on Lake Erie there is a very large commerce, amounting annually to about 30,000,000 tons, composed of iron ore and coal. The ore is carried by boat from Duluth, at the head of Lake Superior, to Ashtabula or Conneaut, a distance of about 1,000 miles, at a charge of approximately 80 cents per ton. It is then loaded on cars and carried 135 miles to Pittsburg for 90 cents per ton, the rate being 10 cents higher to go 135 miles by rail than 1,000 miles by water, and the water rate being about one-seventh of the rail rate. Coal is carried from Pittsburg to these Erie ports at 90 cents per ton and there loaded on boats for shipment to Duluth and other points on the Lakes, where it is hauled at the rate of 35 cents per ton, the water rate in this instance being one-twentieth of the rail rate.

There is a very large commerce on the Ohio River, according to the report of the Ohio River board of United States engineers. The exact cost of carrying this commerce is not stated by the board, but one of its members, Maj. William L. Sibert, of Pittsburg, who is one of the ablest engineers in the Corps, estimates that the cost of conveying freight on the Ohio River between Pittsburg and Louisville in 1905, even in the present unsatisfactory condition of the river, when boats are able to operate only a few months of each year, was 0.76 of one mill per ton per mile, one-tenth of the average rail rate, and that the cost between Louisville and New Orleans was 0.67 of one mill per ton per mile, about one-eleventh of the average rail rate. Hence we have the rate on the Lakes 0.85 of one mill, or one-ninth of the rail rate; on the Ohio 0.76 of one mill, or one-tenth of that by rail, and on the lower Ohio and Mississippi, below Cairo, 0.67 of one mill, or one-eleventh of the average rail rate, which is 7.6 mills per ton per mile. This is certainly a strong showing for the waterways, and the reason why I state above that the rate by water is one-sixth of that by rail is because there are many waterways in the Union on which I have been unable to obtain the rates, and wishing to be as conservative as possible I have reduced the proportion very much from what it would be if the figures on the Lakes, the Ohio, and the Mississippi are correct indices of the average water rates.

This same Ohio River board, in their report on the project for 9-foot navigation between Pittsburg and Cairo, estimate that with the Ohio River improved to that depth the freight charge between Pittsburg and Louisville would be 0.5 of one mill per ton per mile, and between Pittsburg and New Orleans 0.37 of one mill per ton per mile. They quote from an interesting report of Major Mahan, of the Engineer Corps, showing that the Volga River, in Russia, has an annual commerce of about 14,000,000 tons; that the navigation is about six months each year; that the freight charge on cereals is 2.22 mills per ton per mile, on manufactured iron 1.8 mills, on steel 1.6 mills, and on naphtha 1.5 mills. They show, too, that the navigation is nearly all done against the strong current of the river, where it is much more difficult and expensive than in slack water.

As an argument for the adoption of the 9-foot project they say that the steamer Sprague tows to market, from Louisville to New Orleans, sometimes as much as 60,000 tons of freight in one trip. The Kaiserin Augusta Victoria, one of the largest ships affoat, has a freight tonnage of 25,000 tons. The horse-power of the Sprague is 2,175; that of the Kaiserin Augusta

Victoria 17,200, and that of sufficient locomotives to haul the Sprague's cargo on an average grade road 24,000.

A study of the waterway system of Germany, in a recent excellent work on Modern Germany, by O. Eltsbacher, discloses the fact that Germany has developed its waterways to the highest degree, and immense quantities of freight are carried thereon. On the Oder the cost is about 3½ mills per ton per mile, on the Elbe 2½ mills, and on the Rhine 1.8 mills; hence we may say that the water rate in Germany is about 21 mills per ton per mile. Now, this is much higher than the water rate in this country, but the rail rate is higher, for while our rail rate in 1905 was 7.6 mills per ton per mile the rate in Germany was 11.7 mills per ton per mile, hence it would appear that the rail rate in Germany is about five times as great as the water rate.

In passing, I wish to commend most earnestly to every stu-dent of this subject Mr. Eltsbacher's very interesting work, and desire to present a few quotations therefrom. Among other things he says:

Recognizing the importance of cheap transport and of an alternative transport system which would bring with it wholesome competition, Germany has steadily extended, enlarged, and improved her waterways, both natural and artificial, and keeps on extending and improving them year by year; and if a man would devote some years solely to the study of German waterways and make the necessary but very extensive and exceedingly laborious calculations, he would probably be able to prove that Germany's industrial success is due chiefly to cheap transport and the wise development of her waterways.

Everywhere in Germany water transport is being developed with the utmost energy and vigor. On all the rivers and canals industrial activity is marvelously developed, and the development of water transport is becoming almost a sport, if not a passion, with the German business community.

If it were not for the existence of the German waterways, German industries would certainly not be in the flourishing condition in which they are now. When ice closes the German rivers and canals, the export and import trades are at once very seriously affected, and if the German waterways should be blocked for one year the whole of Germany would probably be ruined, for Germany can not live without her

In many cases the profit is cut so fine that an increase of the freight charges by about one-fiftieth of a penny per ton per mile would inevitably kill important industries which are at present killing the industries competing with Germany. Thus Germany's industrial success is no doubt due to a very large extent to the immense assistance she receives from her waterways.

It is clear that transport by water is and must always remain, owing to its very nature, so much cheaper than land transport, be it by road or rail, that railways can not possibly compete with properly organized, properly managed, properly planned, and properly equipped waterways. Hence it is economically wasteful not to extend and develop the natural and artificial waterways which a country possess, and it is absolutely suicidal and criminal to let them fall into neglect and France, Holland, and Belgium have improved their waterways quite as thoroughly as Germany. It is said that freight can be moved from practically any part of these four countries without breaking bulk to any other part. Let us emulate the wise example of the French and Germans in this respect.

Some of you may ask "Where is the money to come from to improve these waterways, and how much is it going to cost?" I wish to be perfectly frank, and say in answer to the last question that no reliable estimate of cost has ever been made, but I can say positively that the sum required to properly improve the waterways of this great country is only a small percentage of the amount which Mr. Hill says is needed right now to build the necessary 73,333 miles of railroads. Of course I do not expect, and no advocate of waterways expects, all of these vast improvements to be made at once. Even if the money were all available, it would take a number of years to complete them; but we would like to see a great advance in the present system and much more rapid progress than in the past.

In answer to the question as to where the money is to come from, I would like to respond in the Yankee style and ask where did we get the one thousand million dollars which the Spanish war and the Philippine Islands have cost us? There is no doubt that this war and the retention of the islands have cost the Republic during the past nine years much more than it would cost to place all our waterways in first-class condition.

We found that money without any trouble, and not one of our citizens suffered because of overtaxation to raise it. Let us find funds for our rivers and harbors. Some persons advocate a bond issue of half a billion dollars for waterways, and if no other means can be found we may have to adopt it, but, in my judgment, there are other means, and I hope that we will not be obliged to resort to a bond issue for this purpose. In his annual message to Congress the President advocated an income tax and an inheritance tax. I strongly favor both of these measures and believe that the country would approve them.

Should they be adopted, there would be ample funds in the Treasury to give our waterways fifty to seventy-five millions a year. If they are not adopted, then other means can and will be found.

In the meantime-and whatever changes, if any, are made in our fiscal policy-I insist that our waterways have not received a square deal in the past, and in behalf of every citizen of the Union who is interested in prompt transportation and cheap freights, I demand a square deal for them in the future. I insist that they are entitled to a much larger percentage of our I insist that there is neither justice nor national expenditures. good business in the policy which gives to war and its rewards in time of peace great appropriation bills every year, carrying an average of more than 40 per cent of our total expense, while river and harbor bills-commerce bills-are passed every three years and carry less than 3 per cent. I insist that it is the duty of Congress to change this policy, to pass river and harbor bills every year, and to have them carry a fair percentage of our national budget—at least three times as much as in the past.

One thing is certain, and he who fails to see it is blind, the renaissance of waterways is at hand. The American people understand their importance and demand proper appropriations from Congress for their speedy and businesslike improvement. They understand that with properly improved waterways the great freight congestion which exists in every State of the Union would be relieved; and they also know that railroad rates would be regulated and reduced far better by legitimate competition on unmonopolized waterways than by any rate commission devised by man. They know that waterways were the principal and best means of transportation on earth during all the tides of time until the advent of railroads a hundred years ago. And while they know that the iron horse is one of the best servants to man, and perhaps the greatest civilizer in the world, he can never supplant the waterway. Hence they demand of us, their servants, prompt and wise provision for the care and improve-ment of these waterways. I beg of you to hearken to their voice. I beg of you to make up your minds here and now to insist upon a complete and radical change in our waterway Our methods have been stingy, slow, and unbusinesslike in the past. Let us make them prompt, liberal, and up-to-date. Let us go at this waterway improvement as though we meant business, and do it right regardless of cost. For the past ten years we have had an average of about twenty millions a year for rivers and harbors. It should not be less than fifty millions a year, and our votes would be applauded if we made it larger than that amount.

Mr. Chairman and fellow-Members, I earnestly implore you to study this great subject of waterway improvement, to my mind the most important one to-day before the American people, and use your great influence in and out of Congress in favor of a broad and liberal, a truly national policy toward our waterways, in favor of an annual rivers and harbors bill carrying fifty millions every year. [Loud applause.]

EXPLANATORY NOTE,

EXPLANATORY NOTE.

An "annual rivers and harbors bill carrying fifty millions every year" is the slogan of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, which is doing its utmost to arouse interest in the cause of waterway improvement. On the 6th and 7th of December, 1906, its third convention was held in Washington, D. C., and the delegates in attendance numbered over a thousand of the most prominent business men of the Union. This great association does not advocate any specific project whatsoever, and is forbidden by its rules to do so, but it stands for generous treatment of all our waterways and sufficient funds to improve every water course in the Union that is worthy. It is firmly convinced that the merits of its cause are so great that if properly understood they will carry conviction to all minds and be irresistible. It earnestly courts a study of and comparison between water and rail transportation, and its officers will gladly assist anyone desiring information. They are as follows: President, Joseph E. Ransdell, Washington, D. C., Lake Providence, La.; secretary and treasurer, J. F. Ellison, Cincinnati, Ohio; directors, William H. Lincoln, Boston, Mass.; Olin J. Stephens, New York, N. Y.; Frank D. La Lanne, Philadelphia, Pa.; Blanchard Randall, Baltimore, Md.; E. J. Hale, Fayetteville, N. C.; W. D. Stillwell, Savannah, Ga.; M. J. Sanders, New Orleans, La.; S. W. S. Duncan, Dallas, Tex.; William B. Rodgers, Pittsburg, Pa.; Albert Bettinger, Cincinnati, Ohio; John A. Fox, Blytheville, Ark.; Lawrence M. Jones, Kansas City, Mo.; Rufus P. Jennings, San Francisco, Cal.; A. H. Devers, Portland, Oreg.; John L. Vance, Columbus, Ohio; Thomas M. Wilkinson, Burlington, Iowa; William P. Kennett, St. Louis, Mo.; M. T. Bryan, Nashyille, Tenn.; James H. Davidson, Oshkosh, Wis.; Harvey D. Goulder, Cleveland, Ohio; E. S. Conway, Chicago, Ill.; W. K. Kavanaugh, St. Louis, Mo.; T. G. Bush, Birmingham, Aia.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, we have all been very deeply interested in the admirable address of the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors made in the House to-day. His statements and figures are convincing. The position taken by the committee in the report now under consideration regarding certain improvements in the country may be sound, but they certainly are amazing. The only alternative now is to accept them with the best possible grace. I particularly have in mind an important navigable stream in the Borough of the Bronx, an arm of the sea known as "Westchester Creek." This improvement was recommended by W. H. H. Benyaurd, lieutenant-colonel, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, under date of November 28, 1890, seven years ago. The value of the commerce for 1906 is estimated at nearly $1,000,000 and is rapidly increasing, due to the great increase of population in the section affected by this improvement. In 1900 the population of the Bronx Borough, one of the five subdivisions of the city of New York, was 200,507, and on January 1 of this year it was 350,000. The section to be benefited by this improvement has doubled its population in the same period and in the next five years will again double its numbers. The demand for building material. coal, and merchandise is very great, and if this improvement is completed it will tend to cheapen freight rates nearly one-half, proving of incalculable advantage and benefit to the people. have been waiting for this for seven years, while not a thing has Now tugs and barges are forced to lie in the East River for hours waiting for high tide, thus adding to the cost of freight. The people there demand that something be done for this important arm of the sea, and as their representative I am here to voice that sentiment.

The reasons assigned by Chairman Burron to-day were, first. that this was practically a new improvement, nothing having ever been appropriated for this waterway, and, secondly, that the rule of the committee is not to consider any improvement that was not recommended by the board of review of the United States Engineer Corps since 1902. Unfortunately Westchester Creek falls under the ban in both cases. I had prepared, and intended submitting for consideration and adoption, under the five-minute rule, the following amendment:

After the word "Creek," in line 23, on page 13, insert the following: "Improving Westchester Creek. New York, making the channel navigable from East River to Westchester, a distance of 2½ miles, including the dredging of the channel across the estuary 100 feet wide and 8 feet deep at mean low tide, at a cost of $42,780, according to the plans, estimates, and surveys made and approved by the Chief of the Engineer Corps, United States Army, under the direction of the Secretary of War, dated September 23, 1899."

Now, Mr. Chairman, realizing the position in which this improvement is placed, I shall not press it, but serve notice on the Committee on Rivers and Harbors that I shall insist upon favorable consideration in the next Congress. In the meantime I will see that the board of review pass upon the feasibility and desirability of this necessary improvement. The East River has received two hundred and fifty thousand--a gain of fifty thousand over two years ago; the Harlem River Ship Canal, one hundred and fifty thousand-a gain of seventy-five thousand; the Bronx River, twenty-three thousand—a gain of three thousand; the Eastchester Creek, six thousand—a gain of twenty-five hundred, with a survey by the Government engi-neers for a 12-foot channel from the Sound to the Mount Vernon thousand; dock at low tide. A survey is also recommended by the committee for a survey of the channel between North and South Brothers islands, all in the Eighteenth district of New York, which I have the honor to represent. I have reason, therefore, to felicitate myself on the results achieved in this Congress.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to have read at the desk an amendment which will be offered at the proper time, and which will be the subject of my remarks.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Toward the construction of a navigable waterway 14 feet in depth, the locks, however, to be so constructed as to permit of a depth of water of 21 feet over the miter sills, from the south end of the channel of the Sanitary District of Chicago near Lockport, Ill., by way of the Des Plaines and Illinois rivers to the mouth of said Illinois River and from the mouth of the Illinois River by way of the Mississippi River to St. Louis, Mo., in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 263, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session, $3,000,000: Provided, That a contract or contracts may be entered into by the Secretary of War for such materials and work as may be necessary to complete said navigable waterway, to be paid for as appropriations may from time to time be made by law, not to exceed in the aggregate $26,000,000, exclusive of the amount herein appropriated.

Mr. SNAPP. The river and harbor act of 1902 appropriated

Mr. SNAPP. The river and harbor act of 1902 appropriated $200,000, or so much thereof as might be necessary, for making such surveys, examinations, and investigations as might be required to determine the feasibility of and to prepare and report plans and estimates of cost of a navigable waterway 14 feet in depth from Lockport, Ill., by way of the Desplaines and Illinois rivers to the mouth of the Illinois River, and from the mouth of the Illinois by way of the Mississippi River to St. Louis, Mo.

Under this authority a board of engineers of the United States Army made the survey from the end of the Chicago Sanitary Ship Canal, at Lockport, to the mouth of the Illinois The survey of the Mississippi from the mouth of the Illinois to St. Louis was made by the Mississippi River Commission.

The report of these two boards was transmitted to this House by the Secretary of War, December 19, 1906. The cost of the channel from the Chicago Sanitary Ship Canal to the mouth of the Illinois River is estimated at $23,543,582, and from the mouth of the Illinois to St. Louis at $6,553,880, a total of An increase of 6 feet over the miter sills of the $30,097,462. locks, if full advantage is to be taken of an increased discharge of water from Lake Michigan in the future, would increase the cost $1.376,000. The feasibility of the project is admitted.

No provision is made in this bill for the performance of this work, and scant consideration was given to the arguments of those who urged it upon the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, the reason being given, among others, that it is a new conception and not entitled to serious consideration at this time, there being so many older projects undisposed of. I shall endeavor to show that it is not a new conception and, by brief and hurried reference to historical facts and legislative enactments, demonstrate that the construction of an improved waterway from Lake Michigan to the Mississippi has for generations been the settled policy of the State of Illinois. idea of connecting the waters of Lake Michigan with those of the Illinois River by a canal passing through that invisible but no less actual dividing line upon which the accumulating waters pause to determine whether they will find their way to the Gulf of St. Lawrence or to that of Mexico, occurred to the earliest explorers of the Northwest, the first to suggest it having been Louis Joliet, in 1673.

The attention of Congress was first directed toward it as a connecting link between the East and West in an able report on roads and canals by Albert Gallatin, Secretary of the Treasury, April 4, 1808. It was subsequently referred to by A. B. Woodward in a report to the Michigan Territorial legislature on internal navigation in January, 1812, and was favorably men-tioned in Niles's Register in an editorial on "Resources and improvements," August 6, 1814.

It was the subject of frequent discussion up to 1816, at which time, with a view to the ultimate construction of such a work. Governors Edwards, of the Territory of Illinois, and Clark, of Missouri, and Col. A. Choteau, as United States Commissioners, made a treaty with the Indians by which the latter ceded a tract of land 10 miles wide along the proposed route, extending from Lake Michigan to the Illinois River. In a report to Congress January 19, 1819, Mr. Calhoun, the Secretary of War, made favorable mention of a canal from "the Illinois River to Lake Michigan which the growing population of the State renders very important" and which would be "valuable for military purposes." In December of the same year he transmitted to Congress the reports of Maj. Stephen H. Long, of the corps of topographical engineers, and one made by Richard Graham and Chief Justice Joseph Phillips, of Illinois, in both of which the practicability and importance of the improvement is strongly commended.

The very boundaries of the State were fixed with this in view. By the ordinance of 1787, there were to be not less than three nor more than five States in the territory northwest of the The boundaries of these States were defined by that Ohio River. The three States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, were to include the whole territory, and were to be bounded by the British possessions in Canada on the north. But Congress reserved the power, if they thereafter should find it expedient, to form one or two States in that part of the territory which lies north of an east and west line drawn through the southerly bend of That line, it was generally supposed, was to be Lake Michigan. the north boundary of Illinois. Judge Pope, Delegate from Illinois Territory, seeing that the port of Chicago was north of that line, and would be excluded by it from the State; and that the Illinois and Michigan canal (which was then contemplated) would issue from Chicago, to connect the Great Northern Lakes with the Mississippi, and thus be partly within and partly without the State of Illinois, was thereby led to a critical examina-tion of the ordinance, which resulted in a clear and satisfactory conviction that it was competent for Congress to extend the boundaries of the new State as far north as they pleased; and he found no difficulty in convincing others of the correctness of his views

But there were other and much more weighty reasons for this change of boundary, which was ably and successfully urged by Judge Pope upon the attention of Congress. It was known that in all confederated republics there was danger of dissolu-tion. The great valley of the Mississippi was filling up with a numerous people; the original Confederacy had already advanced westward a thousand miles across the chain of mountains skirting the Atlantic; the adjoining States in the western country were watered by rivers running from every point of the compass, converging to a focus at the confluence of the Ohio and Mississippi at Cairo; the waters of the Ohio, Cumberland, and Tennessee rivers carried much of the commerce of Alabama and Tennessee, all of Kentucky, considerable portions of that of Virginia, Pennsylvania, and New York, and the greater portion of the commerce of Ohio and Indiana, down by the point at Cairo (situated in the extreme south of Illinois), where it would be met by the commerce to and from the lower Mississippi, with all the States and Territories to be formed in the immense country on the Missouri, and extending to the headwaters of the Mississippi. Illinois had a coast of 150 miles on the Ohio River and nearly as much on the Wabash; the Mississippi was its western boundary for the whole length of the State; the commerce of all the western country was to pass by its shores and would necessarily come to a focus at the mouth of the Ohio, at a point within this State and within the control of Illinois if, the Union being dissolved, she should see proper to control it. It was foreseen that none of the great States in the West could venture to aid in dissolving the Union without cultivating a State situate in such a central and commanding position.

What, then, was the duty of the National Government? Illinois was certain to be a great State with any boundaries which that Government could give. Its great extent of territory, its unrivaled fertility of soil and capacity for sustaining a dense population, together with its commanding position, would in course of time give the new State a controlling influence with her sister States situate upon the western rivers, either in sustaining the Federal Union as it is or in dissolving it and establishing new governments. If left entirely upon the waters of these great rivers, it was plain that, in case of threatened disruption, the interest of the new State would be to join a southern and western confederacy. But if a large portion of it could be made dependent upon the commerce and navigation of the Great Northern Lakes, connected as they are with the Eastern States, a rival interest would be created to check the wish for a western and southern confederacy

It therefore became the duty of the National Government not only to make Illinois strong, but to raise an interest inclining and binding her to the eastern and northern portions of the This could be done only through an interest in the At that time the commerce on the Lakes was small, but its increase was confidently expected, and, indeed, it has exceeded all anticipations and is yet only in its infancy. To accomplish this object effectually it was not only necessary to give to Illinois the port of Chicago and a route for the canal, but a considerable coast on Lake Michigan, with a country back of it sufficiently extensive to contain a population capable of exercising a decided influence upon the councils of the State.

There would, therefore, be a large commerce of the north, western, and central portions of the State afloat on the Lakes, for it was then foreseen that the canal would be made, and this alone would be like turning one of the many mouths of the Mississippi into Lake Michigan at Chicago. A very large commerce of the center and south would be found both upon the Lakes and the rivers. Associations in business, in interest, and of friendship would be formed both with the North and the South. A State thus situated, having such a decided interest in the commerce and in the preservation of the whole confederacy, can never consent to disunion, for the Union can not be dissolved without a division and disruption of the State itself. These views, urged by Judge Pope, obtained the unqualified assent of the statesmen of 1818, and this feature of the bill, for the admission of Illinois into the Union, met the unanimous approbation of both Houses of Congress

In advance of any action by State authority, although both Governors Bond and Coles had recommended it, Congress passed an act March 30, 1822, authorizing

The State of Illinois to survey and mark through the public lands of the United States the route of a canal connecting the Illinois River with the southern bend of Lake Michigan, and 90 feet of land on each side of said canal shall be forever reserved from any sale to be made by the United States, and the use thereof forever shall be, and the same is hereby, vested in the said State for the canal.

The way being thus opened, even though only to a limited extent, so far as regards governmental aid, the Illinois legislature as early as 1823 took steps to provide for the internal naviga-tion of the State by the appointment of commissioners who were authorized to consider, devise, and adopt such measures as shall or may be requisite to effect communication by canal and locks between the navigable waters of the Illinois River and Lake Michigan, and to explore the most eligible route, to cause all necessary maps and surveys to be made and adopt proper plans for the construction of such canal, and made an appropriation to defray the expenses of the commission. Nothing was done by the State under this authorization, except to survey the route of a canal from Chicago to the Illinois River at Lasalle.

March 2, 1827, Congress passed an act providing that-

There be, and hereby is, granted to the State of Illinois, for the purpose of aiding said State in opening a canal to unite the waters of the Illinois River with those of Lake Michigan, a quantity of land egtal to one-half of five sections in width, on each side of said canal, and reserving each alternate section to the United States.

By the act of January 22, 1829, the governor of the State was authorized to appoint three commissioners, whose duty it should be to consider, devise, and adopt such measures as may be required to facilitate the communication, by means of a canal and locks, between the navigable waters of the Illinois River and Lake Michigan and as soon thereafter as they may acquire sufficient funds and deem it expedient, shall commence the work by opening a canal and constructing locks, aqueducts, dams, and embankments to effect a navigable communication between Lake Michigan and the Illinois River.

Under these different acts the State of Illinois was given the right to construct a canal from Lake Michigan to the Illinois River over Government land and selected in pursuance of the last act of Congress every alternate section along the line of the canal, but on account of the State's lack of means nothing substantial was done toward the commencement of the work before 1836, when the legislature of the State passed an act providing that-

The said canal shall not be less than 45 feet wide at the surface, 30 feet at the base, and of sufficient depth to insure a navigation of at least 4 feet, to be suitable for ordinary canal-boat navigation, to be supplied with water from Lake Michigan, and to be constructed in the manner best calculated to promote the permanent interests of the country, reserving 90 feet on each side of said canal to enlarge its capacity whenever, in the opinion of the board of canal commissioners, the public good shall require it.

The said canal shall commence at or near the town of Chicago on canal lands and shall terminate near the mouth of the Little Vermilion in Lasalle County and on land owned by the State.

Under this act the State entered upon the active construction of the canal and continued work thereon till about 1840, when work was stopped for lack of funds. In 1843 the legislature passed an act authorizing the governor to convey the canal and canal lands to three trustees, two of whom represented the owners of the State bonds issued to raise money for canal construction and one of whom represented the State. These three, called the "canal trustees," proceeded to sell the canal lands received from the Federal Government and with the proceeds finished the canal from Chicago to Lasalle, on the Illinois River, 100 miles in length, in 1848. The canal was 60 feet wide at the surface, with a depth of 5 feet, and was the largest canal in existence in the United States. It has been in operation from that day to this, and, it has been asserted by those best informed on the question, contributed more, by giving cheap transportation from the Illinois Valley to Chicago, toward the early growth and prosperity of Chicago than anything else. But conditions changed, and a canal of sufficient size to meet the demands of commerce of that period was entirely insufficient to accommodate traffic twenty years later, and the State immediately took steps toward its enlargement and toward the improvement of the navigation of the Illinois River below Lasalle.

The original plan of the canal, adopted in 1836, was to cut through the divide, so as to draw a supply of water for navigation from Lake Michigan by gravity, which plan was abandoned for the time being, after a large part of the work had been executed, in consequence of the State's inability to procure funds to finish the work, and the level of this division was raised so as to require the principal supply of water to fill the canal to be obtained through the Calumet feeder.

In order to secure the completion of the canal on the deep-cut plan, the city of Chicago was authorized, in 1866, to deepen the Summit division. The work was completed just before the great fire of 1871 at a cost of about $3,000,000. Immediately after the fire a special session of the legislature was called and the entire amount was refunded to the city

By the act of February 28, 1867, while the canal was still in the hands of trustees, the legislature provided for the appoint-ment of canal commissioners to secure the improvement of the Illinois and Michigan Canal and its extension to the Mississippi River.

The commissioners were authorized to make such changes in the location of the canal, or adopting a river improvement instead of the canal between Chicago and La Salle, as might be deemed expedient in a general plan for the river improvement.

The act also provided for the appointment-by the governor of two persons who, together with the governor, shall constitute a committee to present a memorial to the Congress of the United States and urge the necessity of an immediate and liberal appropriation in aid of these improvements; such commission to use its best endeavors to secure an appropriation of at least $7,000,000 in aid of the improvements herein named.

In case the United States should appropriate a sum of money equal to one-half the estimated cost of said improvements, or either of them, the canal commissioners should proceed with the work upon said improvements, in such order and to such extent as in their judgment the condition of the finances and the best interests of the State of Illinois will warrant.

For the purpose of carrying on and completing the improvements mentioned, and of raising the necessary funds therefor, an annual tax of 1 mill on the dollar of all taxable real and personal property in the State was authorized to be levied until the improvements should be completed. The first of the improvements to be begun and completed was to be that of the Illinois River from La Salle to the mouth of said river, provided that if the Government of the United States should appropriate toward the enlargement of the Illinois and Michigan Canal one-half the estimated cost, then the commissioners should proceed with said enlargement in accordance with such appropriation.

About the same time the canal trustees, under authority of the legislature, constructed a lock at Henry, on the Illinois River, 356 feet long and 75 feet wide, at a cost of $450,000, creating a navigable depth of 7 feet from Henry to La Salle, the terminus of the canal; and in 1873 the legislature provided for the further improvement of the Illinois River by the following act:

Whereas in pursuance of an act approved February 25, A. D. 1869, and an act additional thereto, under and by authority of which acts the improvement of the navigation of the Illinois River has been commenced by the construction of a lock and dam in the town of Henry, in Marshall County, which has been completed, and which is a part of a system of locks and dams to the number of five projected by engineers for the complete improvement of the navigation of the Illinois River; and

Whereas no further progress can be made in the improvements of the navigation of said river without further appropriation, such appropriation being now necessary for the building of a lock and dam at or near Copperas Creek, which when completed will add 59 miles of river transportation, and thus tend to the reduction of freights to the headwaters of Lake Michigan and to the Mississippi River: Therefore

Be it enacted, That there be, and is hereby, appropriated the net proceeds of the revenue derived from the Illinois and Michigan Canai and the lock at Henry, on the Illinois River, to be expended in the construction of a lock and dam across the Illinois River at or near Copperas Creek and necessary work in connection therewith; said lock not to be less than 250 feet in length and 75 feet in width: Provided, That the cost of said improvements when completed shall not exceed the sum of $450,000.

Through further appropriations works for the sum of $450,000.

Through further appropriations made from time to time the locks at Henry and Copperas Creek were finally finished about 1877, at a cost of nearly $1,000,000, completing a hundred miles of river navigation, and with the locks at Lagrange and Kamps ville, erected by the United States, gave a navigable depth through the Illinois River from Lasalle to the Mississippi, about 228 miles, of 7 feet.

Many reports have been made by Government engineers on the feasibility and desirability of further improvement of navigation between Lake Michigan and the Mississippi River. Probably the most interesting is that made to the Secretary of War December 17, 1867, by James H. Wilson, then lieutenant-colonel and afterwards Chief of Engineers of the United States Army, and William Gooding, United States civil engineer. port read in part as follows:

and William Gooding, United States civil engineer. The report read in part as follows:

Having been designated by direction of the Secretary of War, through engineer orders dated Washington, May 8, 1867, as a board "to conduct surveys and examinations and to prepare plans and estimates for a system of navigation, by way of the Illinois River, between the Mississippi and Lake Michigan adapted to military, naval, and commercial purposes, in accordance with the act of March 2, 1867," we have the honor to submit the following report:

By a careful examination of the report and profiles of this year's survey, with the map herewith submitted, it will be seen that the location of the present canal from Bridgeport to the valley of the Des Plaines can not be advantageously or economically changed; that it is the best and most direct route which can be found, there having been more than enough work already done in this line to counterbalance the natural but not superior advantages of the slightly lower but more tortuous route by Mud Lake; that the Calumet River and Saganasta route along what is known as the "Calumet feeder" would cost a great deal more than either of the others, being longer and ending at a point where there is neither a natural or artificial harbor and where it would be impossible to construct one which would answer the purpose of commerce and the national defense.

For the foregoing reasons we are decidedly of the opinion that in constructing such a system of navigation as the interests of the country require the Government must follow the general line of the Illinois and Michigan Canal and the Illinois River, and that the line recommended is the only feasible route for deep-water communication between the Great Lakes and the Mississippi Iliver equally adapted to military, naval, and commercial purposes.

We have therefore to respectfully recommend that the improvement in question shall be made by widening and deepening the present canal from Bridgeport to the head of Lake Joliet, with the exception of reservoir of Lake Michigan. The locks in this improvement, in order to admit of their fullest use by naval and commercial vessels, should be 356 feet long between the gates, 75 feet wide, and give a minimum draft of 7 feet.

In considering the importance of this system of improvement in its military, naval, and commercial respects, the report says:

There are but two ways in which we can thoroughly protect our own northern frontier in time of war and relieve ourselves of a continuous menace in times of peace. The Government must either connect the Lakes and the Mississippi River by a canal of sufficient capacity to accommodate gunboats suitable for service on the Lakes or prepare for the annexation or conquest of Canada. As a military measure the construction of a canal will be effective, and fortunately for the country, this can be done at an expense which must be regarded as insignificant when compared with the objects to be obtained. For great as are the military reasons which favor the establishment of steamboat navigation between the Lakes and the Mississippi, they are vastly transcended by those of a commercial and political character. The Lakes, the St. Lawrence River, and the New York canals are the natural outlet for the Lake cities and a great portion of our northwestern territory, as much as the Mississippi River is the outlet for the territory contiguous to it.

Since the construction of the St. Lawrence and New York canals, the commerce of the Northwestern and Western States has gradually been seeking its way to the eastern seaboard rather than the southern. Indeed, the northern tier of our States, even as far west as the Missouri, owe their prosperity, if not their existence, to the development of water communication with the East. Railroads have exerted a potent influence in populating these States, but their extraordinary development in wealth and industry is mainly due to the construction of the Canadian and New York canals, by which, up to the present time, they have been able to send their surplus products directly and cheaply to market. This accounts satisfactorily for the superior wealth of the country bordering directly upon the Lakes, and for the marvelous growth of the cittes which have sprung into existence

United States Army.

Mr. SNAPP. Made in 1867.

As further evidence of the sincerity of the purpose of the State to secure an enlarged waterway from Lake Michigan to the Mississippi the legislature in 1882 ceded the canal and all unsold lands to the United States, on condition-

That the United States shall, within five years from the time that this act takes effect, accept this grant and thereafter maintain the said canal and waterway for the purpose aforesaid. In case the United States shall accept this grant it is upon the express condition that the canal shall be enlarged in such manner as Congress may determine and be maintained as a national waterway for commercial purposes, to be used by all persons, without discrimination, under such rules and regulations as Congress may prescribe.

The United States failing to accept the grant within the time mentioned in the act, the offer was formally withdrawn and the act repealed.

In 1889 the legislature passed an act to "create sanitary districts and to remove obstructions in the Desplaines and Illinois rivers." This was without doubt the most important step. so far taken, toward the creation of a deep waterway through the Illinois Valley, and the works constructed under its au-thority will stand forever as a monument to the foresight and wisdom of the legislature that enacted it. Sections 23 and 24 of that act are as follows:

If any channel is constructed under the provisions hereof by means of which any of the waters of Lake Michigan shall be caused to pass into the Desplaines or Illinois rivers, such channel shall be constructed of sufficient size and capacity to produce and maintain at all times a continuous flow of not less than 300,000 cubic feet of water per minute, and to be of a depth of not less than 14 feet, and a current not exceeding 3 miles per hour, and if any portion of any such channel shall be cut through a territory with a rocky stratum where such rocky stratum is above a grade sufficient to produce a depth of water from Lake Michigan of not less than 18 feet, such portion of said channel shall have double the flowing capacity provided for, and a width of not less than 160 feet at the bottom, capable of producing a depth of not less than 18 feet of water.

If the population of the district drained into such a channel shall at any time exceed 1,500,000, such channel shall be made and kept of such size and in such condition that it will produce and maintain at all times a continuous flow of not less than 20,000 cubic feet of water per minute for each 100,000 of the population of such district, at a current of not more than 3 miles per hour, and if at any time the General Government shall improve the Des Plaines or Illinois rivers so that the same shall be capable of receiving a flow of 600,000 cubic feet of water per minute, or more, from said channel, and shall provide for the payment of all damages which any extra flow above 300,000 cubic feet of water per minute from such channel may cause to private property, so as to save harmless the said district from all liability therefrom, then such sanitary district shall, within one year thereafter, enlarge the entire channel leading into said Des Plaines and Illinois rivers from said district to a sufficient size and capacity to produce and maintain a continuous flow throughout the same of not less than 600,000 cubic feet of water per minute, with a current of not more than 3 miles per hour, and such channel shall be constructed upon such grade as to be capable of producing a depth of water not less than 18 feet throughout said channel, and shall have a width of not less than 18 feet throughout said channel, and shall have a width of not less than 160 feet at the bottom.

When such channel shall be completed and the water turned therein to the amount of 300,000 cubic feet of water per minute, the same is hereby declared a navigable stream, and whenever the General Government shall improve the Des Plaines and Illinois rivers for navigation, to connect with this channel, said General Government shall have full control over the same for navigation purposes, but not to interfere with its control for sanitary or

The navigability of any channel constructed under that act was further insured by an amendment made by the legislature in 1897, providing that no part of the taxes levied for its construction should be used for the construction of permanent or fixed bridges, and that all bridges should be constructed so that they can be raised or swung out of the way of vessels navigating the channel, but that no district should be compelled to operate bridges as movable bridges for a period of seven years, unless the needs of general navigation on the Desplaines and Illinois rivers, when connected with such channel, should sooner require it. The policy of the State in favor of a 14-foot waterway through the valley is further evidenced by a resolution of the general assembly adopted in 1889, reading as follows:

That it is the policy of the State of Illinois to procure the construction of a waterway of the greatest practicable depth and usefulness for navigation from Lake Michigan via the Desplaines and Illinois rivers.

That the United States is hereby requested to stop work upon the locks and dams at Lagrange and Campsville and to apply all funds available and future appropriations to the improvement of the channel from La Salle to the mouth, with a view to such a depth as will be of present utility and in such manner as to develop progressively all the depth practicable by the aid of a large water supply from Lake Michigan at Chicago.

That the United States is requested to aid in the construction of a channel not less than 160 feet wide and 22 feet deep, with such a grade as to give a velocity of 3 miles per hour, from Lake Michigan at Chicago to Lake Joliet, a pool of the Desplaines River, immediately below Joliet, and to project a channel of similar capacity and not less than 14 feet deep from Lake Joliet to La Salle, all to be designed in such manner as to permit future development to a greater capacity.

The sanitary district of Chicago was organized under the act

The sanitary district of Chicago was organized under the act of 1889. It is entirely true to say that the act was passed to enable Chicago to construct a canal from Lake Michigan to the Desplaines River. The district began the work in 1892 and completed the main canal from the Chicago River to Lockport, where it empties into the Desplaines River, in 1899. from Lake Michigan was turned into the canal January 2, 1900. The canal varies in width from 160 feet through rock to 202 feet through dirt; has a water depth throughout of 24 feet, and will float the largest lake vessels loaded to full capacity. district is now widening and deepening the Chicago River to provide for the full flow of water from Lake Michigan allowed by the act. It is also about to construct a 22-foot navigable channel from the Calumet River, connecting with the main channel at the Sag. The cost of the work done and contemplated will approximate $70,000,000.

To make more certain, if possible, that the idea of a deep waterway had not been and would not be lost sight of by the State, the legislature, in 1897, adopted the following resolution:

Whereas the general assembly of 1839 passed "An act to create sanitary districts" and provided thereunder for the disposal of the sewage of the city of Chicago through the Desplaines and Illinois rivers by means of a canal across the Chicago divide of such capacity as to dilute the sewage beyond offense, and such sewage disposal was granted on the condition that said channel should be so constructed as to form part of a navigable waterway between Lake Michigan and the Mississippi River, and on the theory that to produce a waterway of magnitude, as demanded by modern conditions, required a large and constant volume of water flowing through the Illinois River; and

Whereas the construction of the sanitary canal of Chicago and the large volume of water required to flow through the same will bring lake and river navigation, which are now 320 miles apart, within 60 miles of each other, and the development of the intermediate section between Lockport and Utica will furnish a through route from the Great Lakes to the lower Mississippi by way of lower Illinois river; and

Whereas we believe the making of a deep waterway of the Illinois River to be an undertaking which is national in its character and should be accomplished by the General Government for the general welfare, the inland and maritime commerce of the nation, and for the nation's defense in time of war: Therefore, be it

*Resolved. 1. That it is the policy of the State of Illinois to procure the construction of a waterway of the greatest practicable depth and usefulness for navigation from Lake Michigan, by way of the Desplaines and Illinois rivers, to the lower Mississippi River.

2. That the lock and dams on the Illinois River at La Grange and at Kampsville should be removed whenever the supply of water as required by law is turned into the said river by means of the Sanitary Canal of Chicago; and the United States is hereby respectfully requested to enter upon the improvement of the alluvial portion of the Illinois River by means of a system of channel improvement, so as to fully utilize the flow of water from Lake Michigan.

3. That the rock-bound section of the Desplaines and Illinois rivers, from the end of the Sanitary Canal of Chicago at Lockport to the head of the alluvial river at Utica, should be developed for a navigable depth of not less than 14 feet, and that the United States is requested to enter upon this work in cooperation with all lawful agencies provided for in this State and in harmony with the policy herein set forth.

Of course the primary object of the people of Chicago in seek-

Of course the primary object of the people of Chicago in seeking this legislative authority was purely sanitary. a method for disposing of the sewage of that great and growing city that would prevent its finding its way into Lake Michigan and polluting the source of the city's water supply. The canal is designed to act as a river that rises in Lake Michigan, crosses the divide, and empties into the Desplaines River. It is so proportioned that in flood periods it carries off the flood waters and sewage that enter the Chicago River. In dry weather it draws in through the river the lake water required for a proper dilution of the sewage.

The primary purpose of the State of Illinois in enacting this legislation was more comprehensive. The necessity of giving Chicago an outlet for its sewage was clearly recognized, but the State impressed upon this legislation an unaltered determination to secure at some time an improved and deeper waterway through the Illinois Valley. The consistency of the State's purpose is made manifest in every provision of the act and amendments thereto.

A channel for drainage purpose only could have been dug for a small fraction of the cost of this canal. But the State had in view the extension of lake navigation to the Mississippi. An outlet for lake commerce to the South and a cheap highway from the South to the Lakes had been the consistent purposes of the State for many years. In the Drainage Canal the State authorized a large project within her own borders that is an In the Drainage Canal the State essential part of such a waterway. It cuts the continental divide between the Great Lakes and the Gulf of Mexico. It opens a ship canal through this barrier 24 feet deep, and enlarges and deepens the Chicago River at a cost of over $50,000,000. At the same time, the canal turns into the lower Illinois River the flow which is required to make a deep waterway from Lake Michigan to the Mississippi.

The Illinois Valley is the relic of a great estuary filled up with silt and ooze by the weathering of many centuries. The valley is wide and the banks of the river are low, and dams are a very limited and doubtful improvement here. For a deep waterway in this river a deep channel must be dug out and a flow turned down the channel that will fill it. A flow that gives a waterway 24 feet deep in the drainage canal will give a deeper channel in the lower Illinois River. It is true that the channel in the river must be twice as wide, but this flow can be counted on to give a waterway about 15 feet deep through the lower Illinois River. To dig out such a channel with hydraulic dredges is a small matter. A fraction of the dredging done on the Mississippi would cut the deep waterway A fraction of the through the mud bottom of the lower Illinois River, the drainage-canal flow in it this channel would not fill up in a century. From the drainage canal to Utica, on the Illinois River, the waterway will be made by dams in the river. It will be like an ordinary canal only much bigger, and will use the channel of the river instead of digging a new channel. In this section the flow from the drainage canal will easily maintain a depth of 22 feet.

The estimated cost from Lockport to the mouth of the Desplaines River is $7,822,000, more than half of which will be saved to the Government by the extension of the channel of the Chicago Ship Canal to Joliet and the development of water-power rights from Lockport to the Kankakee River by the construction of dams, equally necessary in the development of the waterway. It can be safely stated, therefore, that the cost of the entire pro-ect will not exceed $26,000,000 to $28,000,000.

It must not be forgotten that the entire expense of a channel 22 feet deep from Lake Michigan to the Illinois River and a 14foot channel from there to the Mississippi large enough to carry the water from Lake Michigan to fill it would cost in the neighborhood of $100,000,000.

The work authorized by the State and now nearly completed will give a 22-foot channel for over 40 miles at a cost of nearly $70,000,000. This vast sum, the expenditure of which was permitted in order to carry out the aim of the State to create a deep waterway from Lake Michigan to the lower Mississippi, was raised entirely within the limits of the State. Not a dollar has been contributed by the Federal Government. It seems only reasonable that the State should ask the Government to contribute the one-fourth of the total expense necessary to complete the project, especially as when completed it will become the property of the nation. The benefits to be derived from such a highway can not be over estimated. It will create a seaboard from the Lakes to the Gulf and give a short haul to all the commerce of the interior.

It will bring a world's market to the center of nature's great storehouse between the Rock!es and the Alleghenies. On it ores, fuels, and building materials that are now out of reach may be assembled and find a value. It will gather food for the man and the man's machine and create new industries by bringing the iron ores from Superior by all-water route to the inexhaustible coal fields of the Illinois River Valley.

A board of Government engineers reported favorably on the project of an improved waterway along this line in 1886, and said:

The waterway from Chicago to Grafton, on the Mississippi River, is a most important one and, when completed, there is little doubt will richly repay for itself in the reduction and regulation of freights.

Illinois has more than met the expectations of its early settlers. Its population of 850,000 in 1880 now approaches 6,000,000. It has advanced in material interests until it now stands third in population, second in manufacturing, and first in railroad mileage. Chicago, grown from a hamlet in 1848, when the Illinois and Michigan Canal was opened, has a population of more than 2,000,000, and no one can fix the limit to its future growth. What, then, is the duty of the National Government? has become a great State. As predicted by Congressman Pope in 1816, its great extent of territory, its unrivaled fertility of soil, and capacity for sustaining a dense population, with its commandiag geographical position, will in time, if it has not now, give the State a controlling interest with her sister States in the Mississippi Valley. Her people, from the time the State was admitted into the Union, have consistently and persistently worked and striven for a deep waterway from the Lakes to the Gulf. It is not a new conception. It is older than the State itself. Her people are determined to have it. There can be no better evidence of the strength of this determination than the voluntary expenditure by her citizens of $70,000,000 toward the complete project. The feasibility of the project is admit-ted. Its desirability is evidenced by the demand of a great The plain duty of Congress is to recognize the justice of Illinois's claims, accept the benefits of her liberality, and provide the means for the immediate completion of the work. [Applause.]

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Chairman, there has been but one general river and harbor appropriation bill since 1902, and that bill, passed in 1905, authorized an expenditure of only $32,167,-Although at that time the pressure for appropriations for the improvement of our rivers and harbors was very great, the committee realized the necessity for the strictest economy in public expenditure and acted accordingly. A much larger bill is now imperatively demanded by our growing commerce, and the bill which you are considering carries a very large sum. The authorized expenditure is large, but I am sure it will prove a wise and reasonable expenditure. It will be an investment from which the people will receive very large returns. The money will be spent for home development, for the building up of our agricultural, industrial, and commercial interests. day a most pressing reason for generous appropriations arises from the fact that the railroads are absolutely incapable of meeting the demands for transportation of our products. is becoming more and more necessary to use to the fullest extent our waterways

The task of the committee has been difficult, the demand for improvements of this nature coming from all portions of the country being so urgent. Many will be disappointed because the projects in which they were especially interested have been omitted or because the amount appropriated is not as large as hoped for. Our aim has been to consider each project on its merits, and now that the bill is before the House we desire the fullest discussion. There will be no effort to crowd the bill through hastily. River and harbor bills were at one time brought into the House under an ironclad rule and forced to a vote without opportunity for either debate or amendment. This has not been done, I am glad to say, for some years; in fact, not since the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Burrow] has been chairman of the committee. There has been no political nor sectional line in our committee room. I certainly hope there may be given to this bill the most careful consideration, and, if errors have been made by the committee, that they may be corrected here.

The problem of the cost of transportation is of most vital importance to all our people. We aid the producer when, by a reduction in the cost of transportation, he is able to reach more distant markets. The need of wider markets is evident. General prosperity must continue to be due in large measure to the growth of our foreign commerce, and if we are to compete successfully in the markets of the world our products must be put into those markets at the lowest possible price. During the past quarter of a century there has been a remarkable decrease in the rates for carrying freight from this country to Europe. In 1880 it cost from 8 to 10 cents to carry a bushel of grain to Liverpool. To-day the rate is from 2 to 3 cents per bushel, and all rates on incoming and outgoing freight have been reduced in that proportion. This reduction is due directly to the increased size of ocean-going steamships. In 1880 such steamships drew from 18 to 20 feet of water, while to-day they draw 32 feet and more. The need, then, for deeper channels in our great harbors is imperative. Our harbors must be improved to accommodate the ships of to-day. In my opinion all the great harbors of the country should be supplied at the earliest practicable moment with channels of a depth of 35 feet.

I wish to say a word concerning the large expenditure authorized in the pending bill for the completion of a 35-foot channel in Boston Harbor. In 1902 Congress adopted a project for a channel 35 feet in depth from Charlestown Navy-Yard through Broad Sound to the sea, with a width of 1,200 feet in the inner harbor and 1,500 feet in the outer harbor. The engineers estimated the probable expense at $8,000,000. The necessary expenditure was large, because underlying ledges occur irregularly all over the harbor, and it was found that a great amount of deep-sea rock excavation would have to be made. The cost of the project was so great that Congress did not feel that it could, in the bill of 1902, authorize the completion of the work. It did, however, adopt the project and appropriated $3,600,000. That amount will have been expended by the end of the present year, and it has therefore been necessary in this bill to provide for the completion of the channel. In the bill of 1902 there were also adopted other projects for harbor improvement where the cost was so large that appropriations could only be made for prosecuting the work. These projects were at Philadelphia, New Orleans, Cleveland, the St. Mary River, and at the mouth of the Columbia River. Provision has been made in this bill for the completion of all these projects except the one at Cleveland. I wish to call attention to the fact that the State of Massachusetts has not depended exclusively upon the National Government for the improvement of its harbors and waterways.

Since 1874 the State has appropriated for Boston Harbor

Since 1874 the State has appropriated for Boston Harbor alone the sum of $2,123,050.46, and during the same period has expended upon other river and harbor work $643,477.95. The State has done its share in the past and will continue to do so in the future. In the bill of 1905 there were appropriations for Massachusetts based upon the condition that the State should participate in the expenditure, and the same is true of the pending bill.

Boston Harbor is the second port of the United States in the value of its foreign commerce, and that commerce is steadily growing. It must be provided with channel facilities of a harbor of the first class, to which it is entitled as one of the great seaports of the world. This appropriation should not be charged exclusively to the State of Massachusetts. It is made for a great national project. Less than 10 per cent of the cargoes carried from Boston Harbor by our great steamers consist of local shipments. More than 90 per cent comes from the West and the South. In 1905 material gains were made in the foreign trade of the port of Boston, the increase in the value of imports and exports amounting to $25,728,809. The total value of the foreign trade in 1902 was $164,799,789. In three years it increased to $199,863,885. In addition, the in-transit and transshipment trade passing through the port amounted to $23,271,599, making the total foreign trade for 1905, $223,135,544. In the volume of foreign commerce the port of Boston is to-day second only to the great port of New York. Customs collected at the port of Boston from all sources amounted to—

There has also been a substantial growth in passenger business, the number of passengers arriving and departing having increased from 86,849 in 1902 to 101,706 in 1905. I also submit the following statistics relative not only to foreign entrances and clearances, but also to domestic and coastwise arrivals and departures in 1905:

In order to accommodate this vast and growing trade it is necessary to complete as soon as possible the work now being prosecuted on the deep-sea channel. The appropriation made therefor is justified by the volume of commerce and because the improvement is national in its scope and the benefit conferred It is in the interest of the whole country.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, I was very much struck by the position taken by the distinguished chairman of this committee in the course of his remarks. First, he asked my colleague whether there were any precedents for a channel as long and as deep as that of the Delaware, either in this country or particularly in Europe; secondly, he stated that the engineering problem had not been solved as to whether it was possible to maintain that channel at a depth of 30 feet, and therefore a survey for a 35-foot channel could not be granted.

To begin with, in regard to the first proposition, I think it is the first time that Americans have ever been told to go to Europe to seek for a precedent as to whether what was proposed to be done by this country or to be accomplished by American engineering skill could or could not be accomplished. All we have to do, as far as that is concerned, is to point to the Panama Canal, which was surrendered by France, where it was always supposed that the best engineers in the world were produced up to recent times. French engineers surrendered that proposition—the Panama Canal—because they were unable to complete it. Americans took hold of the proposition, the American Government undertook it, and American engineers are now setting to work to do what foreign engineers found it impossible for them to accomplish. Therefore I think we can dismiss both the proposition that there is no precedent for a channel greater than the 30-foot channel to Philadelphia and the suggestion that it would be impossible for American engineering skill to keep that channel open as utterly irrelevant.

WHAT EUROPEAN CITIES HAVE EXPENDED IN IMPROVING HARBORS AND

walnawaro.
Liverpool, for its harbor, more than	$130,000,000
Manchester, on canal to sea	75, 000, 000
Marseille, breakwater, quays, and warehouses	20, 000, 000
Hamburg, for port and dredging the Elbe to the sea	40, 000, 000

London and Liverpool have spent on their ports and the Thames more than the United States has expended on all its ports since the Government was formed.

Let me call attention particularly to what has been done at Glasgow, Scotland, as described in the Philadelphia North American:

There could be no more forcible object lesson in channel digging than the dogged determination that has given to Glasgow, formerly with only a shallow ditch between her and the sea, an outlet through which her commerce might be carried to the world.

When the work of digging out the trench began, there was exactly 1 foot and 3 inches of sluggish water at mean low tide in the shoalest part between Glasgow and the Firth of Clyde. To-day the former ditch admits and floats to Glasgow, a distance of 20 miles from Port Glasgow on the firth, such immense craft as the Campania and the New York.

Characteristic Scotch pluck won for the city on the Clyde its mag-

New York.

Characteristic Scotch pluck won for the city on the Clyde its magnificent waterway. There is, of course, no comparison between the problem Philadelphia has to face and that which Glasgow solved. The Clyde was deep digging from the city to the sea. On the two shoalest places there was 1 foot 3 inches and 1 foot 6 inches of water, and within 6 miles of the city were six important shoals. The tremendous amount of dredging that had to be done to provide the Scottish waterway is indicated by the fact that the total cost of the improvements was more than $60,000,000—many times the amount that a 35-foot Delaware channel could cost, even at the widest estimate.

In an interview with the distinguished chairman, as far back as November, 1903, he is quoted in a leading Philadelphia journal as follows:

journal as follows:

"Unquestionably," said Mr. Burron, in reply to a question, "the investments made by this Government have been profitable to the nation. This is especially true of the harbors having the largest traffic. There is pressing need to have the important ports provided with such channels that the largest boats may enter and leave without danger.

"The expense of giving ample opportunity for these larger boats to enter will be more than repaid by reduced freight rates. This benefit belongs to the whole country and not to any particular port."

In reply to a question as to what depths of water American ports should have, Mr. Burron said:

"Of course, it is desirable to have the greatest possible depth within reasonable bounds. It is, however, time that boats having more than 30 feet draft will come to ports where great quantities of freight are available, and the owners of large boats can rely on finding a large cargo. A channel of this depth would only be used from a port from which certain classes of freights are shipped in very large quantities to foreign ports."

I think these opinions, just quoted, of the distinguished

I think these opinions, just quoted, of the distinguished chairman are as good an argument as can be brought for the need of a 35-foot channel.

But the important point is this, Mr. Chairman, that the demand in my city, the demand in the State of Pennsylvania, for the survey of a 35-foot channel is something that can not be conceived by Members of Congress, can not be estimated, and it is something that the people of the city of Philadelphia and the people of the State of Pennsylvania—in fact, the people of the whole United States—ask for. They demand that every port of entry of these United States shall be capable of receiving, as my friend from Massachusetts has just said, the largest vessels that float for carrying freight and commerce. This spirit and this desire has been redoubled after a study of the items of the present bill before the House. In proportion to the great wealth and commerce of the State of Pennsylvania we do not seem to be getting as much as other States. This desire for the channel has also been redoubled in view of the statements made concern-This desire for the channel ing the survey; in view of the statements made by the engineer in charge of that work, because he has given assurance that this survey for the 35-foot channel can go step by step with the completion of the 30-foot channel-that is, as one section is completed the survey for the 35-foot channel can be made of that section, so that when the whole scheme is completed in December, 1908, the survey for the 35-foot channel will be ready. Unless the survey can be completed then, unless it can be brought before the House at that time, and provision for the 35-foot channel asked for, it will be four years before any appropriation can be made for a 35-foot channel for the Delaware River, and perhaps ten before the channel can be completed, thus causing Philadelphia to remain out of the race with Boston, New York, and Baltimore for ten years to come.

Now, Mr. Chairman, another question was raised at the hearings of the subcommittee as to what the commerce of the city of Philadelphia demanded. It is not what the commerce of the city of Philadelphia demands to-day, but what the commerce of the city of Philadelphia and the State of Pennsylvania, and all the States lying back of Pennsylvania and on either side of it, can be developed into at that port. As we can not bring the largest ships there, how can we tell to what extent that commerce may be developed? Efforts have been made to bring large ships up the present channel, but they have had to be withdrawn. amount that we are asking to be given to the great city of Philadelphia and State of Pennsylvania, or rather to the great port of Philadelphia, in comparison to the customs receipts and in comparison to the internal revenue collected does not, to my mind, seem very great. The customs receipts, for instance, for the city of Philadelphia for 1906 alone were $20,053,000; the internal-revenue receipts for the same year were $21,049,000, while the amount carried in this bill for Pennsylvania is but $2,481,042. I therefore consider, Mr. Chairman, that the demand for a 35-foot channel, in view of what the city of Philadelphia and State of Pennsylvania are turning into the coffers of the United States, is not asking much.

An effort has been made to compare the conditions which maintain at Philadelphia with certain other cities in the United States and the therefore relative importance of the Delaware. Let us consider them for a moment.

COMMERCE OF CERTAIN CITIES.

From the Monthly Summary of Commerce and Finance for December, 1905, the imports and exports of merchandise from 1895 to 1905 are given as follows:

City.	1895.	1900.	1905.
Imports. Charleston, S. C. Mobile, Ala. Galveston, Tex Portland, Oreg	$510,000	$1,382,000	$2,257,000

Appropriations have been made to these harbors as follows:

 Charleston Harbor, 1852 to 1900
 $4,672,000

 Galveston Harbor, 1870 to 1889
 8,528,000

 Mobile Harbor, 1878 to 1900

Population and estimated wealth of certain States for 1900 and 1904, as furnished by the census:

State.	Population	Estimated true value of property.

On the other hand, let us consider for a moment the estimated wealth of Pennsylvania and Philadelphia.

1. WEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA, 1904.

The Census Report for 1904 gives the estimated true value of all property in Pennsylvania for that year as follows:

Real property	$6, 591, 055, 583
Live stock	160, 190, 227
Farm implements	54 175 943
Manufacturing machinery	515, 945, 638
Gold and silver coin	168, 383, 753
Railroads and their equipments	-1, 420, 608, 000
Street railways	570, 452, 043
All other	1, 992, 809, 119

2. WEALTH OF PHILADELPHIA.

According to Bulletin No. 50, from the Census Department for 1904, the wealth of Philadelphia as assessed that year, the assessed value being put at 100 per cent of the true value, was as follows:

Real property Personal property	 $1, 215, 750,635 1, 706, 570

Total --1, 217, 457, 205

The commerce of Philadelphia for eleven months ending November, 1906, compared with the same commerce for eleven months ending November, 1905 and 1904, was as follows:

Importe.
1904 1905 1906	$49, 216, 404 63, 542, 047 65, 779, 759
Exports:
1904	60, 795, 517
1905	62, 975, 514
1906	80 695 871

Mr. Chairman, as the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LAWRENCE] suggested, this is only a business proposition, for the reason that wherever channels have been deepened it has increased the commerce of the port, and it has cheapened the cost of freight on the articles that were to be

The Inter-Nation, a journal of economic affairs, calls attention to the meeting of the Rivers and Harbors Congress and points to a striking example:

The importance to all sections of the country of the improvement of seaboard harbors has recently been shown by members of the Rivers and Harbors Congress, who point out, for example, that in 1880 the average vessel entering Boston Harbor drew 22½ feet, carried 2,500 tons, and charged 8 to 10 cents per bushel on grain to Liverpool. To-day the average vessel draws 30 feet, carries 7,500 tons, and charges 2 or 3 cents. Charges on other classes of freight have been reduced in proportion, and this result is largely due to the deepening of the channel at an expense of $5,000,000. Representative RANSDELL of Louisiana, the president of the Rivers and Harbors Congress, in commenting upon these figures recently, said:

"Think of what that means to the American people—a saving of 6 cents on every bushel of wheat or corn, a saving of $39,279,260 on the average wheat crop and $134,650,560 on the corn crop. And yet you ask if the farmer in Minnesota is interested in the five millions spent on Boston Harbor!"

What is true of Boston is equally true of the ports of New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore. As I have just said, the developed wealth of the State of Pennsylvania, not counting the untold resources of that great State, amounts to-day to the huge sum of $11,500,000,000. In a report which was made by the distinguished harbor master of the city of Philadelphia he showed that two-thirds of all the ships that were engaged in the commerce of this country, flying the American flag, were built upon the Delaware River, and the president of the Cramp Shipbuilding Company, in an article he published, showed that 90 per cent of all of the materials that were used in the building of ships, no matter where they were built, came from the State of Pennsylvania.

It must also not be forgotten that the United States is expending large sums at Philadelphia for the development of the League Island Navy-Yard on account of the superior advantages which it enjoys from its location, being near to the great sources of supply and removed from the possibility of attack in case of war with a foreign power.

As in commerce, the ships of our Navy are being replaced each year by larger vessels, and therefore if the Delaware is to be used by vessels of the Dreadnought type, and larger, the channel of the river must be of a character to accommodate them.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I consider that I shall not be asking too much for our great State and for the great port of Philadelphia when I shall ask, as I propose to, that a certain amount—the bare $10,000 necessary for the survey—may be set aside out of the sum already recommended in the bill. In referring to the appropriations made for other States, I wish it distinctly understood, as I said yesterday, that I do not begrudge them a dollar of what they are to receive under this bill. It is simply that I am asking for the port of Philadelphia, the State of Pennsylvania, and for all of this great country that the port of Philadelphia should be made equal to any other port on the Atlantic coast. The distinguished chairman of this committee said something in regard to charity beginning at home.

I only wish, Mr. Chairman, that the distinguished chairman of this committee would move his residence and become a citizen of the city of Philadelphia and of the State of Pennsylvania, and then, rather than contributing to the Federal Government for governmental work, the State and city might perhaps have their claims looked at, particularly this claim for a 35-foot channel, in a more generous light—not that we complain in regard to the amount which has already been given for finishing the 30-foot channel, but to the total allotted to the State of Pennsylvania; and, as I said, the distinguished gentleman does not realize, nor do the Members of this House realize, what it means to the citizens of Philadelphia and Pennsylvania to have tons and tons of freight rolled daily through the city of Philadelphia on the way to New York. And why? Simply because it is impossible to bring ships of sufficient draft up to the wharves in the city to carry that freight to its destination beyond the seas. Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope that the Members of this House, when the amendment I speak of is offered, will look upon it in the light, not of giving something that is prayed and begged for, but something that belongs to the city of Philadelphia, to the State of Pennsylvania, and to the United States as a matter of right. [Applause.]

APPENDIX No. 1.

United States Department of Agriculture,
Bureau of Statistics,
Washington, D. C., February 1, 1907.

Dear Sir: The inclosed tabular statement of the net tonnage of vessels engaged in foreign trade that cleared from United States ports during the fiscal year 1906 has been prepared in response to your request for the same, addressed to the Assistant Secretary.

It is impossible to obtain this information strictly by ports since the records of the tonnage are for customs districts instead of for ports. The districts have been classified as Atlantic, Gulf, etc., so that totals could be readily made for the different coasts.

Very respectfully,

VICTOR H. OLMSTED, Chief of Bureau.

APPENDIX No. 2.

HARBOR MASTER OF PHILADELPHIA,
Philadelphia, December 14, 1906.
To the honorable members of the United States Senate and House of Representatives from the States of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Delaware.

Representatives from the States of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Delaware.

GENTLEMEN: As harbor master of the port of Philadelphia, I deem it my duty to transmit to you the following statement of the ship-building interests of the Delaware River, so that they can be used by you in the manner you think best as a further argument why the channel of the Delaware River should be so deepened that the various steamships which they have built.

According to the Thirty-eighth Annual List of Merchant Vessels of the United States, issued by the Bureau of Navigation, Department of Commerce and Labor, under date of Washington, D. C., August 13, 1906, there were afloat on June 30 of this year (and with 5 added, built since then) 254 American-built seagoing merchant steamships over 1,000 tons gross register flying the American flag; and 176 of them, or more than 69 per cent, were built on the Delaware River.

To aid American shipbuilders to rehabilitate the American merchant marine seems to be one of the great questions of the present time, and to deepen the channels of the great harbors of this country is one of the ways to do it. And a river that produces more than two-thirds of all the seagoing American-built steamships afloat should certainly come under the head of a deserving case.

Mr. COUDREY. Mr. Chairman, the Middle West has been discriminated against. In the rivers and harbors appropriation bill just presented to this House, which carries appropriations amounting to millions of dollars, the Mississippi River between St. Louis and Cairo only gets a very paltry sum of the total appropriation of over $83,000,000 carried by the bill, and onefourth goes for improvements on or identified with the Great Lakes. I ask, Is this right of just? No; and I want to enter my protest against it. The people of the Middle West are enshown them by the members of this most important committee. We don't want less than $1,000,000 a year for the next four years to continue the improvements as planned by the Government engineers in 1881.

FOURTEEN FEET THROUGH THE VALLEY A NECESSITY.

Fourteen feet through the valley to-day is a commercial necessity against the congestion of freight and the relief to the railsity against the congestion of freight and the relief to the railways, and an absolute necessity to the shippers of this most important section of the country. When a man like Mr. James J. Hill, with his vast railway interests, points out the fact that the railway facilities are not increasing as rapidly as trade demands, then we are remiss if we do not take heed coming from such a source. A 14-foot channel clear through to the Gulf from the Lakes would go farther to relieve the Middle West and would do more to promote their interests than any other work that this House could undertake.

THE GREAT RIVER CONVENTIONS.

The greatest river convention ever held in this country was St Louis last November. It is a well-organized body. They in St. Louis last November. It is a well-organized body. They represent all avenues of trade, and the manufacturers and merchants are a unit when it comes to this great project.

The presence of the most representative men at every convention held for the furtherance of this most worthy project, coming, as they do, from every section of the country, indicates the interest which the people of this whole country have in this most important subject. These men have left their homes and vocations at their own expense and, in many instances, at serious inconveniences to give expression and to voice their sincerest convictions concerning the improvement of our Capital is ready and will be invested in boats and barge lines when the Mississippi River particularly is made navigable.

I am much surprised that the Government engineers in one of their reports stated that this deep waterway project would not be a success from a commercial standpoint. I think that they should confine themselves to two subjects: First, is the plan feasible? Second, the cost. I am quite sure that they are not good judges of the commercial necessities of this country, but the business men are. The total tonnage in and out of St. Louis is 39,000,000 tons, and there is a million tons between Chicago and St. Louis alone. What we want and must have is a great midcontinental waterway uniting the Lakes and the Gulf. It has been one of the dreams of the far-sighted business men of the United States for years and years.

GOVERNMENT SURVEY OF 1886.

The Government survey of 1886, under the provisions of the river and harbor act of the same year, directed the Secretary of War to appoint a board of engineers to examine, in all their relations to commerce, the Illinois and Michigan Canal and the proposed Hennepin Canal, and to consider their value and all other matters connected with their usefulness to navigation, and to report upon the acquisition of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, as proposed by the legislature of the State of Illinois, as well as the construction of the Hennepin Canal. This board reported that in its opinion the waterway from Chicago to Grafton, on the Mississippi, is a most important one, and when completed there is no doubt that it will richly pay for itself in the reduction and regulation of freight rates.

GOVERNMENT SURVEY OF 1889.

Evidently aroused by the recommendation of the report of the survey of 1886, Congress in the river and harbor act of 1888 authorized a survey for the purpose of securing a continuous waterway between Lake Michigan and the Mississippi River having capacities and facilities adequate for the passage of the largest Mississippi River steamboats and naval vessels in time of war. The survey was directed for the channel improvement by locks and dams in the Illinois and Des Plaines rivers, from La Salle to Lockport, so as to provide a navigable waterway not less than 160 feet wide and not less than 14 feet deep, and to have surveyed and located a channel from Lockport to Lake Michigan, at or near the city of Chicago, such channel to be adapted to the purposes above named. The engineers in whose charge this work was placed subsequently reported that there existed an inconsistency in the requirements of the act—a 14foot channel was unnecessary to afford adequate depths for the passage of large Mississippi River vessels and that an 8-foot channel would be sufficient. Now, estimates were made; a 14-foot channel would cost $48,000,000 and an 8-foot channel would cost $23,000,000. This 8-foot channel, Captain Marshall stated, would open the avenue of commerce and have an annual maximum capacity of 30,000,000 tons between the Great Lakes, with its terminus at their greatest port, and a system of navigable rivers penetrating one-half of the States and Territories, with a total navigable length equal to more than one-half the circumference of the globe.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER SADLY NEGLECTED.

The Mississippi River has been sadly neglected; it has received a very small part of the many millions of dollars that have been spent on rivers, harbors, and canals.

$500,000,000 BOND ISSUE.

The steady decline of freight rates through the influence of waterway transportation is noticeable. I believe the only solu-tion of this great problem is to authorize the issue of $500,-000,000 worth of bonds, as outlined in the bill which was introduced a few days ago by my esteemed colleague [Mr. Bar-THOLDT]. This matter has been agitated one way or the other for many years, but until now there never has been such a likelihood of the whole country becoming interested.

THE GREATEST PROJECT.

The progressive, fearless, and farseeing men of the Middle West and South demand that Congress do its duty and meet squarely the greatest project ever conceived in the history of the country's internal development. While the expense of construction seems large, I claim that the traffic will more than justify the expenditure, and we have at our backs the merchants, manufacturers, and farmers throughout this broad land, This project has passed through many vicissitudes and many plans have been submitted to accomplish the results desired. even as far back as 1822, by an act of Congress the State of Illinois was authorized to survey through the public lands of the United States the route of a canal to connect the Illinois River with the southern bend of Lake Michigan. In 1823 the general assembly of the State of Illinois appointed a board of commissioners, and they were instructed to have this route surveyed. In 1827, by an act of Congress, 284,000 acres of public lands were granted to the State of Illinois to aid in the expense of construction. Additional grants were made in 1842, and even in 1854, when the canal had been completed. This gives you some idea of the time these projects have been agitated.

VANDERBILT'S LINE OF STEAMERS.

We know the estimate that railroads have of waterways and their value, for when a system of railroads like that operated by the Vanderbilt system, reaching from New York to Chicago, puts a line of steamers on the Lakes as rivals to their own roads they do and must appreciate the value of waterways.

20,000,000 PEOPLE AFFECTED BY GREAT ARTERY.

The Middle West know their country and fully realize its stupendous interests, the immense and growing population, and the vast area of the territory drained by the Mississippi River whose shipping interests would contribute to such a waterway, contend and know that a 14-foot stream through the valley would pay; fully 20,000,000 people live in the States through which this great artery would run, and at least one-half of the agricultural products are produced in these States, and you will also find here more than one-half of the live stock, horses, and mules of this country. The manufactures of these States, though yet in their infancy, are marvelous and vast in their extent. The history of every artificial waterway on earth tells us that the tonnage carried, where facilities are ample, will double and even treble in a decade.

FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

I have spoken upon the neglect of the western waterways and the tendency, running back many years, to put more money upon the Atlantic seaboard than upon the rest of the country. It might not be amiss to point to the fact that the United States is way behind in the improvement of its waterways and in the construction of canals. The steady increasing water commerce is one of the wonders of industrial Europe. can rest assured that if France, Germany, or any other foreign country contained a stream of water with the possibilities that the Mississippi River has, it would not be neglected for any length of time.

WATER TRANSPORTATION REGULATES FREIGHT RATES.

Water transportation all over the world has been steadily advanced for many years, and high freight rates have to a no small degree contributed to this result. Every country on the globe has the freight-rate question to contend with, and the experience of Europe indicates that the improvement of its waterways is an intensely practicable way to solve the problem. Look at the decrease of rates on grain from Chicago to New York since 1868; the average rate per bushel for wheat by rail was 48.6, and after a gradual decrease it had fallen to 9.98, and so on with other comparisons.

TRANSPORTATION FACILITIES INADEQUATE.

It goes without saying that the present conditions demonstrate that transportation facilities are totally inadequate for the prompt and economic transportation of the produce of the Within the last ten years the tonnage moved by the railroads has been increased 47 per cent, while during the same period railway mileage has increased only 20 per cent. Hundreds of millions of dollars are lost annually to our farmers and other producers by the failure of the National Government to provide the assistance which only improved waterways will give in increasing facilities for transferring freight.

PANAMA CANAL.

The opening of the Panama Canal, which will so greatly fa-cilitate our trade with the Orient and place us in closer relations with the South American republics, demonstrates that water transportation is one of national and international importance. The time has now arrived when the United States, with greater national advantages, must also recognize the connection of the waterways proposition under the economic development of this country.

RIVER REGULATION IS RATE REGULATION.

We who represent the middle western portion of the United States believe that "14 feet through the valley" is the only solution to the problem and that "river regulation is rate regula-

Mr. FLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that I am in hearty sympathy with any movement for the improvement of our rivers. I desire to call the attention of the House especially to certain reports made in reference to the White River which affect my own district and to ask permission of the House to print extracts from the report of the engineer relating to that subject and also some correspondence germane to the issue,

As a Representative from the State of Arkansas I take pleasure in expressing my approval of the general purposes of this bill. Arkansas has many rivers, and it is claimed that she has more miles of navigable waters than any State in the Union. It is therefore of vital importance to the people of my State that a liberal policy be pursued by the Government in improving and maintaining, for purposes of navigation, our waterways. In this connection I desire to call the special attention of the House to a local project affecting my own district and to a certain report made by Major Fitch, the engineer formerly in charge of construction work on White River, dated September 29, 1903, in which he recommends a discontinuance of the further construction of locks and dams thereon. I here and now enter my solemn protest against the correctness of the theory on which said report is based, deny the reliability of data and alleged conditions on which the same is predicated, and therefore challenge the soundness of the conclusions drawn therefrom

The project of improving the upper White River by means of locks and dams was undertaken by the Government some years ago in keeping with a plan recommended as feasible and desirable by William L. Sibert, captain of engineers, in a report made by him dated November 28, 1896. I do not deem it necessary to incorporate in my remarks his report, as same is a public document.

From this report it will be found that the distance from Batesville to Buffalo Shoals is about 90 miles; that the difference in elevation between these two points is about 140 feet. The plan proposed is to construct ten locks and dams, 14 feet high, at the foot of each of an equal number of shoals, and thus and thereby secure and maintain slack-water navigation on this portion of the river the year round. In accordance with this plan, approved by the Engineering Department and by Congress, this work was undertaken by the Government and by Congress, this work was undertaken by the Government and locks numbered 1 and 2 constructed. Lock numbered 3 is now in course of construction, and 1 am glad to note that this bill carries an item of $73,500 for the completion of the same.

But, Mr. Chairman, after locks numbered 1 and 2 had been completed. Modern Fitch, the completed of the same.

completed, Major Fitch, the engineer who was then in charge of these works, made the report already referred to, recommending the discontinuance of further construction of locks and dams on the White River. It is a remarkable report, and inasmuch as I mean to criticise it, I will submit the following extract from it. Omitting formal parts, the report is as follows:

tract from it. Omitting formal parts, the report is as follows:

When this project (that for the improvement by locks and dams, Batesville to Buffalo City) was adopted there was no railway in the upper White River Valley above Batesville, and all that section of country was dependent either upon wagon transportation over mountain roads to railways quite a distance off or upon the very uncertain transportation by boat down the White River to Batesville, where railway connection could be made. Neither the large quantities of zinc ore in Marion, Boone, Baxter, Newton, and Searcy counties, of Arkansas, nor the fine marble beds in this section could be operated with profit, because no facilities existed for cheap transportation; hence it appeared that the improvement of this stream for all the year round navigation should be undertaken by the General Government. Batesville, being a railway point, and Buffalo shoals, being near the southeastern border of the mineral belt, were selected as the terminals of the section of the river to be improved.

This arrangement made the St. Louis, Iron Mountain and Southern Railway, at Batesville, the final carrier of any commerce arising on upper White River and destined to a distant point. The White River Railway, at Batesville and Jacksonport (38 miles below) is not navigable all the year. Therefore this project, if carried to completion, would make of upper White River an isolated improvement. Having in view only the making of an outlet for the upper White River country and remembering that the markets are to the north and east, there would not have been much gained by extending this project down to the naturally deep water below the mouth of Black River, for Newport would have simply been another point of connection with the Iron Mountain Railway system. It is true that a railway connection would have been offered at Jacksonport, but at that time the White and Black River Railway, which has a terminus there, was only a local road. Railway conditions in the upper White River co road from the Editesa Springs than to the entering the mineral belt from the west.

The White River Railway Company, a St. Louis, Iron Mountain and Southern Railway enterprise, is now building a road from Batesville, Ark., to Carthage, Mo. This line follows directly up the White River River, entering and passing through one section of the mineral belt. During the past year this road was carried from about the proposed location of Lock No. 3 to Cotter, and is now operated to Buffalo City, the upper limit of this project.

Within a short time train service will be established to Cotter, a new town about 1 mile below McBees Landing and 12 miles above Buffalo City. These roads, of course, furnish better transportation facilities than have heretofore existed, and it is to be expected that the country will be filled rapidly with settlers and that several small town will be established. From this probable increase in population, and hence in business, it might be argued that commerce on upper White River will be increased through the building of these new railways; but, when one takes into consideration the fact that the final outlet as well as the initial inlet to any commerce that may pass-over the river is the railway, this argument seems unsound. It is hardly probable that shippers will elect to transfer freights from a railway to boat for only a short-distance shipment on the view when the allway from which it was transfered passes through the same plate at your form which it was transfered passes through the same plate at your form of this project. If the original loading be no beat, it is but a short distance until the freight must be removed from the boat and be leaded the plate of the plate of the plate of the plate of the color of the color

As already stated, this report was made by Major Fitch, of the United States Engineering Department. I regret to say it was afterwards confirmed by a board of Army engineers, composed of Col. Clinton B. Sears, Maj. H. C. Newcomer, and Capt. G. M. Hoffman, for each of whom I have a very great respect. I have no criticism to offer this board for their action further than to say that their investigation was made on hurriedly gathered statistics and meager data, and that their examination and inspection of the river, to my own personal knowledge, were made under most trying and unfavorable conditions; and I therefore conclude that they relied much on Major Fitch, who was opposed to the project, and were thus led into the serious error of adopting his report.

The board of engineers aforesaid embody in their report the foregoing extract from the report of Major Fitch-concur in it—and as I remember, give only two additional reasons for abandoning this project, namely, that this work should be abandoned or the river should be further improved between Batesville and Newport, and also that the cost of constructing Locks 1 and 2 was in excess of the original estimates.

These reports I do not think can be justified. Let us analyze them. What reasons are given therein for abandoning this project? Bear in mind, it is admitted that White River is navigable at all times from Newport to its mouth. I do not know the exact distance from Batesville to Newport, but I judge it to be about 35 or 40 miles. The first reason the engineers give for abandoning this work is a conditional one, and that is that the improvement above Batesville should be abandoned unless the river is further improved between Batesville and Newport. This argument I consider wholly untenable. From Newport to the mouth of the river the distance is 264 miles, and the river is navigable the entire distance the year The river between Batesville and Newport is navigable almost the year round, and even if additional work were required to make it navigable at all times, such new improvement would be amply justified; for by maintaining the river between Batesville and Newport and completing the system of locks and dams above Batesville, you would add 127 miles of navigable waters to the White River throughout the year. The White River, I may add, is conceded to be the finest stream in the State for purposes of navigation.

The second reason suggested for abandoning this enterprise is that the cost of constructing Locks Nos. 1 and 2 was considerably in excess of the original estimate. That reason would lead to the abandonment of all public works. How many improvements of any kind are made within the limits of the original estimate? If that rule were adopted, I suspect that every item in this bill for the completion of unfinished Government works would have to be stricken out.

The third and chief reason given for recommending the discontinuance of the further construction of these locks and dams is embraced in the foregoing extract and strikes me as a remarkable one. Stripped of verbiage and circumlocution and succinctly stated, it is simply this: When this project was un-dertaken there were no railroads in the upper White River country. The only means of transportation afforded was by wagons and by the White River, and that this work was then deemed desirable; that now the St. Louis, Iron Mountain and Southern Railway Company has extended its line up the White River for the entire distance of the proposed improvement, and that the St. Louis and North Arkansas Railway Company has built a line into that territory from the west; and that these railroads will supply all the demands of commerce, and that therefore this river improvement is no longer desirable.

He also suggests that at the time of making his report another project was on foot to use New Orleans as a point for export, the scheme being to build a line of railway from New-port up the west bank of White River to the zinc fields, this railway to operate in connection with a barge line to be run between Newport and New Orleans. He further volunteers the information that the promoters of this enterprise represent that the necessary bonds have been floated and that actual construction of the railway will begin soon. This last railroad project referred to, I wish to say, proved to be a fake railroad. never built. Can you imagine a more ill-founded or fallacious argument for the abandonment of a meritorious work of river improvement than is here presented? That argument would stop improvement on nearly all our rivers. For how many of them are not paralleled by railroads? It entirely ignores the value of river transportation as a means of cheap transportation within itself and as affording competition with railroads by the establishment of competing rates. Besides, the engineer is mistaken in his conclusions of facts. It is not true that the only market for zine is found in the North and East. Much zinc is shipped from this country and sold to European smelters. Zinc for the foreign markets is usually transported to New Orleans and shipped from that point. It is not true that the railroads heretofore built and now in operation in northern Arkansas are now supplying or can supply the demands for transportation of its growing commerce. Right at this time, all along the line of the St. Louis, Iron Mountain and Southern Railroad, up and down the White River, there is a car shortage. I received a few days ago a letter from a prominent and reliable citizen of my own town, Mr. B. J. Carney, urging me to work for the completion of these locks and dams on the White River, and calling attention to the deplorable traffic conditions on the railroad. The letter is as follows:

YELLVILLE, ARK., January 16, 1907.

Hon. J. C. FLOYD, Washington, D. C.

Hon. J. C. Floyd, Washington, D. C.

Dear Sir. Mr. Fitch, the deposed engineer of Government works for the improvement of White River, some time ago recommended the discontinuance of the work on the ground that there was no further necessity for it, giving as a reason that the demands of this country for transportation facilities had been fully met with by reason of the Missouri Pacific Railroad Company having built a line of railroad parallel with White River, with ample capacity to more than meet all the requirements of this country for transportation facilities. Now, the fact of the case is this: So far as I can learn, there are demands for cars all along the line which the railroad company seems wholly unable to fill. People, in some instances, have been waiting four months for cars to take their products to market. At Buffalo, Flippin, Pyatt, and Zinc there are great piles of cedar, zinc concentrates in bins, and considerable cotton bales, besides a great many carloads of lumber, awaiting shipment. At our town of Yellville there are at present about 200 carloads of cedar, cotton, zinc concentrates, carbonate of zinc, and other products awaiting shipment, but the railroad company can not furnish cars fast enough.

This country has just begun to develop, and if the railroad company can not meet the demands for transportation at this stage of development, what will they do later on when the country is further developed by the operation of more of our zinc mines, which are starting up every day? There is a probability of more development in our mines this year than has been done for several years past, and in the course of a few years, at the same rate of progress as we have had in the past, it would take several railroads to move the products of the country. So I think it highly important that the White River improvements be continued, and if possible to have the work going on continuously, have them do so. It would be still better to have the work going on at all the dams at the same time, and then I do not Just a word, Mr. Speaker, as to the resources and possibilities of the upper White River country. In the territory drained by the White River and its principal tributary, the Buffalo, lie the counties of Boone, Newton, Searcy, Marion, and Baxter, which have been aptly characterized by a local newspaper writer as "the five mineral states of Arkansas." Zinc and lead of high commercial value and in great and apparently unlimited quantities abound throughout the region. In 1893 a chunk of free zinc ore, weighing 12,750 pounds, was shipped from the Morning Star mine, in Marion County, and placed on exhibit at the World's Fair in Chicago, where it took the premium as being the largest piece of free ore ever mined. In 1904, at the Louisiana Purchase Exposition, in St. Louis, Arkansas took the gold medal for the best collective zinc ores on exhibit. In addition to lead and zinc, there exists throughout the region inexhaustible beds of high-grade merchantable marble-red, variegated, gray, and jet black. Copper and iron have also been discovered in a number of places. Undisturbed forests of fine hard-wood timber abound in many portions of the district. In addition to its wonderful mineral resources, north Arkansas is well adapted to farming and stock raising. It is also highly adapted for fruit growing, and in the past these agricultural products have constituted the principal resources of this terri-The development of these wonderful resources is held back, hampered, and impeded by lack of proper transportation facilities. To be able to furnish a country of such infinite and varied resources and possibilities with a means of cheap transportation, such as the White River properly improved would afford, in my judgment, would prove a source of immense advantage, and is certainly an object highly desirable.

I appeal from the decision of the engineers to the common sense and sound judgment of the Members of Congress, in the hope that when the time comes for making appropriations for the construction of additional locks and dams you will re pudiate a report not warranted by existing conditions, ill founded in fact, and fallacious in its conclusions.

Mr. Chairman, I favor a broad and liberal policy on the part of the United States Government for the permanent improvement and maintenance of all our waterways for purposes of navigation.

River improvement just at this time is especially desirable for two reasons

We need river transportation not only on account of its affording cheaper freight rates than the railroads, but also as a means of affording competition with the railroads, which is one of the most effectual means of regulating and cheapening railroad rates.

We need river transportation to aid the railroads in carrying to the markets the splendid commerce of this great country of ours. To-day all over the United States we hear complaints of a shortage of cars. The present congested conditions of freight and traffic are such that railroad companies themselves seem utterly powerless to relieve the situation. Our commerce has outgrown our facilities for moving it. In my judgment, therefore, no subject of greater general interest or of more farreaching importance can engage the attention of Congress at this time than the formulation and promulgation of legislation on a systematic and extensive plan for the permanent improvement of our waterways.

During the first session of the present Congress much time was devoted to the preparation and discussion of the railroad rate bill. Traffic conditions had become intolerable to both the shipper and the people. The Dolliver-Hepburn bill was brought in, amended and passed, and the country is to be congratulated upon this patriotic effort upon the part of Congress to restrain the greed, limit the injustice, and to correct the inequalities and abuses of interstate railroads. I cheerfully supported the railroad rate bill, and would have supported the had its provisions been far more drastic. I hope and believe that much good will be accomplished under that act. But it should be remembered that in every age and country the great financiers, whose mission has been to control and direct vast aggregations of wealth under corporate franchises, have often manifested the utmost contempt for laws and lawmakers, and have not scrupled to defeat the ends of justice, sometimes by secret, but oftentimes by open and flagrant, violations of plain statutes. I therefore think the best way to regulate railroad rates is to enact laws that will tend to bring about competition between different railroad companies, and also to improve our waterways, and thus compel the railroads to compete with river transportation rates. History furnishes numerous illustrations of the wisdom of this course

I will cite one instance in point: During the reign of William and Mary a resolution passed in the British Parliament providing that all the subjects of England had equal rights to trade in the East Indies unless prohibited by act of Parliament. This destroyed in law the exclusive privileges formerly exercised by the old East India Company. Mr. Child, who was at the head of the old company, wrote to his agents in Bombay and Calcutta: "Be guided by my instructions, and not by the non-sense of a few ignorant country gentlemen who have hardly wit enough to manage their own private affairs and who know nothing at all about questions of trade." How often in our own time have the great captains of industry, the masters of high finance, given utterance to sentiments similar to these! I mention this instance not, however, for the purpose of showing the insolence of this great monopolist, but because it shows there is a more effectual way of regulating monopolies than by commissions or than by statutes fixing directly rates and charges to be made by them. That method is by the enactment of laws pro-viding for free competition. This was the means adopted in the British Parliament in 1694, "by those ignorant country gentlemen who had hardly wit enough to manage their own private affairs and who knew nothing at all about questions of trade." Notwithstanding the contempt expressed by the greatest financier of that age for these "ignorant country gentlemen," time has demonstrated that the act complained of was one of masterly statesmanship. That law has stood the test of more than two centuries. It has given to England commercial supremacy on all the seas. It was a law that established free competition be-tween all the tradesmen of England.

That is what we propose to accomplish by a systematic and permanent river improvement in this country. We propose to improve our rivers so that navigation can be maintained on them continually with safety and profit, and thereby give the railroads free and widespread competition.

Can a subject of more vital importance engage our attention? The transportation problem, and the proper means of regulating and controlling it, is the most momentous question before the American people to-day. No man can live unto himself alone. The prosperity and the wealth of the community, the State, and the nation depend largely upon their commerce. Commerce depends largely upon facilities for transportation and the reasonableness of rates charged therefor.

The railroad in its very nature is more or less a monopoly. By consolidations and combinations, some legal and some illegal, the railroad companies have concentrated their interests into a few great systems, each of which is controlled by one head, which has resulted in giving to each an exclusive monopoly in carrying traffic in many sections of the country. In view of this situation, which no man can gainsay, I consider it the highest wisdom on our part to lend our aid to every movement looking to the general and permanent improvement of all our waterways. Let the pilot return to his post. Line these magnificent natural highways of commerce with boats and barges. In this way, in spite of combines, in spite of evasions of rate laws, we can compel the railroads to carry traffic in many sections at a river rate, or at least in competition with a river rate, either of which, by reason of a reduction in freight charges, would mean the saving of millions of dollars each year to the people of the United States and would assure them ample facilities for transporting their products.

Mr. Chairman, it is a well-known fact to those posted on the subject that there is not a town, city, or port in the United States that enjoys the advantages of water transportation that does not thereby secure the benefits of a cheaper railroad rate than those places not blessed with water transportation. This is true whether any goods are shipped by boat or not, for wherever water courses are so improved that boats may traverse the waters, then the railroad companies, in order to hold the traffic, must maintain low rates, and the people receive the benefit of the low rates.

The desirability of river improvement at this time is accentuated and emphasized by another great enterprise of international significance which has been undertaken by the United States Government. I refer to the construction of the Panama Canal. The completion of this great canal, the most gigantic work of the kind ever undertaken in the world, will give additional importance to every Gulf port. A vast volume of com-mercial products now shipped to the Atlantic and Pacific seaports will be diverted from usual channels of trade and will be transported south to New Orleans, Mobile, and other southern Products from the Orient now reaching this country by way of San Francisco and New York will be transported through the Panama Canal into the Gulf and land in southern ports and thence be shipped directly into the interior of the United States. Already north and south lines of railroads have been and are being constructed in anticipation of these changed conditions.

It is wisdom on the part of the Representatives of the people of the Mississippi Valley to keep constantly in mind the commercial changes and advantages that will be brought about by the completion of this great work. The changed conditions will affect in a marked degree the whole commerce of the Middle West. To this end no movement is fraught with greater local interest or benefit to our two great inland cities, St. Louis and Chicago, and all the States tributary to them than the proposition put forward by the deep-waterway convention held in St. Louis in November last, and indorsed by appropriate resolutions, recommending an appropriation of $50,000,000 annually for the improvement of our waterways. I favor that recommendation. I also favor that other great project recommended by that convention, namely, to deepen the Chicago Canal and the Illinois River and improve the Mississippi below the mouth of the Illinois, so as to secure a 14-foot channel from the Lakes to the Gulf. And, furthermore, permit me to say I favor supplementing these greater enterprises by the improvement of all the tributaries of the Mississippi. The beautiful Ohio, the murky Missouri, the tortuous Arkansas, the scenic White, the sluggish Red, the historic Tennessee, and all the others should receive just and proper attention. Let the rivers that flow into the Atlantic and Pacific likewise receive their just proportion of every appropriation made. In short, I favor a broad, liberal, and general policy that will further and promote river improvement throughout the country—North, South, East, and West.

Mr. Chairman, to these high and patriotic ends I propose to lend my influence and my vote so long as I have the honor to be a Member of the House of Representatives.

I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, were it not for the very great importance of the Delaware River as an artery of commerce I would not venture at this early stage of my Congressional career to speak at this time. The subject has been before this House frequently, and so long as rival ports have deeper waterways than has the Delaware, just that long the people will be insistent that the Members of Congress who represent them here shall move on and on to the desired object. In the few questions propounded to the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Burron], in the earlier stages of the proceedings, it developed that New York and Boston and Baltimore, great ports and properly aided by the Government, were accorded a depth of channel at least to the point of survey of 35 feet. It developed, also, that Philadelphia had knocked at the door of the River and Harbor Committee and had asked to be put upon the same basis, and that that request had been denied. The only thing left for the Representatives of this State to do is to present their case fairly here and to appeal to this House. So long as the demands of commerce require it this Banquo's ghost will not down. It must be presented patiently and earnestly until the House listens.

A few words, perhaps, with regard to the great State that is asking for this recognition of a deeper channel may be appro-I read from the census report of 1905:

New York, Pennsylvania, Illinois, and Massachusetts, in the order named, are the four leading manufacturing States. They contain 83,333, or 39.9 per cent, of the establishments of the entire country, and in that year gave employment to 2,488,046, or 45.5 per cent of the average number of wage-earners, and report $6,978,331,091, or 47.1 per cent, of the value of products. The States east of the Mississippl River and north of the Mason and Dixon's line and the Ohio River contain 65.5 per cent of the establishments in the United States, and gave employment to 74.1 per cent of the humber of wage-earners and report 73 per cent of the total value of products.

Quoting further from the same report:

The four leading States, in the order of their importance as to the greatest number of wage-earners employed at any one time, were New York, 1,075,777; Pennsylvania, 926,685; Massachusetts, 578,208, and Illinois, 478,488.

Still further I quote:

Still further I quote:

Pennsylvania has an ideal location for obtaining raw material and for distributing the products, since it is within easy access of the Great Lakes, the Atlantic Ocean, and the Mississippi River. The Ohlo, Allegheny, and Delaware Rivers, together with the canal and the railroads, furnish an excellent means of transportation. Probably no single factor, however, operates more favorably for the advancement of the States in manufactures than the abundance and excellence of its supply of fuel. In 1902, at the census of mines and quarries, Pennsylvania reported a production of 98,574,367 short tons of bituminous coal, or 37.9 per cent of the total for the United States; 36,940,710 long tons of anthracite coal, or the entire production of this country; 12,063,880 barrels of petroleum, or 13.5 per cent of the total, and natural gas to the value of $14,352,183, or 46.5 per cent of the total.

All the States, all these products, slope toward the valley of the Delaware and find an exit there to the ports of this country the Delaware and find an exit there to the ports of this country and to the ports of Europe. The census of the manufactures of the United States, which I beg parenthetically to observe, are more than two times in excess of value over those of agricultural products of this country, show a total valuation of manufacturing output for the year 1905 of $14,802,147,087.

Pennsylvania, the second manufacturing State of this Union, with that enormous output of manufacturing values, presented $1,355,551,332, or one-seventh of the entire output in manufacturing values of the entire forty-five States of this Union. Pennsylvania is first in the manufacture of iron and steel; first in the manufacture and output of glass; first in the manufacture and output of carpets, rugs, and other textiles; first and exclusive in the production of anthracite coal; first in shipbuilding; and upon the very Delaware concerning which we are speaking she produces more than twice the number of ships that sail the American flag over all the other shipbuilding ports of the entire forty-five States of this Union combined; first in the manufacture of leather and leather goods, and first in many other articles of production too numerous at this time for me to mention. The population of this country, according to the census of 1900, was 76,303,387. The population of Pennsylvania, the second manufacturing State of this Union, was 6,302,-115, or one-twelfth the population of the entire forty-five States of this Union. Surely such a State, coming here with a request in the interest of its commerce, is entitled to consideration at the hands of this distinguished body.

Pick up the bill that has been completed with such great care by the painstaking Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and we find 343 separate items of appropriation, widely and generally distributed over the various States and Territories of this Union, a total appropriation to all the States of $83,466,138 and to the State of Pennsylvania-manufacturing one-seventh of the entire output of this country, having one-twelfth of the en-tire population—an appropriation not alone for the Delaware, not alone for the interests of the third city in manufactures and population, the city of Philadelphia, but for that other marvelous metropolis in manufactures, the home of the iron and steel industry, Pittsburg-for all this State we find in this bill appropriated by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, $2,481,-042, or one-thirtieth of the entire appropriation made to the forty-five States of this Union. I do not appeal to this House to be unfair to any one of the States represented. I do not inveigh against the action and the report of the Committee on Rivers I have nothing but praise and commendation for the strong and high-minded man who stands as a guardian of the interests of this country at the head of that committee, but I do say that when we find upon the Atlantic seaboard rival ports, three of them receiving at the hands of this committee a depth of channel of 35 feet, which permits vessels of that draft to come and go between points in this and foreign countries, we think we have the right, in all fairness, according to the rest of the country—all that is coming to it through this bill, and all that has come and all that will come—we have the right to ask to be placed upon a plane of equality with our competitors along that coast. For that reason, Mr. Chairman, we present our arguments. We shall continue to do so, because the necessities of trade are imperative, because the interests are not special but general and apply to all the States that border upon this great river, the Delaware. [Loud applause.]

Mr. LARRINAGA. Mr. Chairman, I want to make a few remarks about the appropriation for Porto Rico in the river and harbor bill, because I believe that the appropriation for the harbor of San Juan is not only of local importance, but it is also of national importance. The engineer commissioned to study the matter of the ports of the island of Porto Rico, Major Flagler, recommended, I believe, $1,400,000 for the ports of the island. The Committee on Rivers and Harbors assigned only $157,500 in cash and $600,000 for contracts, making in all $757,500. The island of Porto Rico, Mr. Chairman, has for many years past worked in the line of improving its harbors as well as its coast navigation. Small as it is, it has from sixteen to eighteen lighthouses around the coasts and the surrounding small islands. I doubt whether there is any piece of territory as small as Porto Rico with such a perfect system of light-houses. For many years prior to the American occupation, the harbors of San Juan, Mayaguez, and Ponce had their harbor works board. The works were carried out, of course, the same as the lighthouse system, with the money from the island; not a cent came for that from the Crown treasury. At the time of American oc-cupation there were three boards of harbor works, namely, at Mayaguez, Ponce, and San Juan. But on May 12, 1900, an act of Congress was enacted establishing a different civil government in Porto Rico. The matter of harbor works, as well as everything else in the island, passed into the hands of the executive council of the island, and one of the first things that the council did was to suppress the board of harbor works of San That board was composed of the best citizens of the It had its own funds, which were collected from different sources than the government or the Crown appropriations were gotten from. It was managed independently of the officials of the government and independently of the Crown or state administration. The board had a complete outfit for dredging the harbor. It had two dredges, one an English dredge, and a large beam or bucket French dredge. It also had all the barges and lighters necessary, as well as tug boats, portable rails, dumping wagons, sheds, stores, machine shops, and, in fact, everything that was necessary to carry on the work. It had been working for a few years and had already removed some of the worst shoals in the bay. It had deepened the channel somewhat, and it was necessary to carry the deepened the channel somewhat, and it was necessary to the deepened the channel somewhat, and it was working so well that the dredging of the harbor had become a money-making proposition. The material that could be dredged out for $3.50 would just make a square meter of solid ground on the swamps around San Juan which sold for $5 and $6.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the question will naturally be asked why such a good institution was discontinued. I myself can see no reason for it, except that such institution was too autonomical, too liberal, too independent, too good to be kept in operation by such a tyrannical body as the executive council created by the act of April 12, 1900.

The President, Mr. Chairman, in his report alludes to having landed in Ponce, on his way from the Panama Canal, where he crossed the island to San Juan, and then had to return to Ponce in order to take the Louisiana, for the reason that the Louisiana could not come around the island and take the President on board at San Juan, by reason of the fact that the channel was not deep enough for her.

When the battle ship Massachusetts had the terrible accident at the island of Culebra four years ago it was obliged to go into San Juan, with great difficulty, for repairs, and to take care of the dead and wounded. But the Massachusetts is only of 10,000 tons register, and the Louisiana, or any of the larger battle ships of 14,000 tons, will never be able to get into the channel at San Juan. And why so, Mr. Chairman? Because the harbor works of San Juan had been discontinued for the last six years. Had they been conducted at the rate at which they were going in 1900, the channel at San Juan Harbor would have to-day at least 30 feet depth, and there would be enough anchorage in the harbor, because the shoal of Punta Larga, which is the one main obstruction in the harbor, has only about two and one-half or three million cubic yards to remove, and that would have been easily removed in the space of time I have mentioned with the facilities which were at the disposal of the harbor works.

The commerce of Porto Rico has lately increased a good deal. According to the last report the trade has amounted in the last fiscal year to about $54,000,000. With the advantage of free trade that we have for our sugar and tobacco, and all the products of the island except coffee, the probabilities are that our commerce will increase very rapidly, and every day we will experience more and more the necessity of having a good harbor. But, as I said before, from a military point of view the harbor of San Juan is as necessary to the nation as it is from a commercial point of view to the inhabitants of Porto Rico. So, Mr. Chairman, although the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has reduced the appropriation from $1,400,000 to about half of that amount, I am thankful to that committee because of the fact that at last Congress is in the way of doing something for the island. And I wish here to improve this opportunity of not only thanking divine Providence for having put the interests of Porto Rico in the same line as those of the great American nation [applause], but I also wish to thank the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors for having done something for the poor island of Porto Rico. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, my object in discussing the proposed improvement of the Ohio River is to place before Congress certain facts now buried in various reports heretofore made upon this subject and others with which I am personally familiar, with the desire of contributing what I can in aid of this very essential improvement. What the people of the Ohio Valley want is a 9-foot stage in the river from Pittsburg to Cairo. Occasionally we get much more water than that, and recently we had much more water than we needed. In 1883 and 1884 we had our worst floods in that valley and we have had high water at intervals since. At first we were fearful that these floods would imperil the prosperity of the Ohio Valley, but our fears vanished when during the subsequent years we learned from experience that our growth was not in the least curtailed, but went constantly on with ever-increasing force. One singular fact impressed itself deeply upon the minds of our people, and that was that during the era of hard times, from 1893 to 1897, the people of the Ohio Valley suffered less financial reversal than the people of any other given territory in the United States. The most of our factories kept running, at least a portion of the time, real estate continued active, and we were not compelled to inaugurate free soup houses. This was due to the diversity of industries along the banks of the Ohio, and the advantage accruing to our people in preferential freight rates made possible by the competition of the Ohio River with the railways. And the recent flood will not retard or impede in the least the steady and continued onward march of the people of the Ohio To-day you can see in the cities and towns of that valley not a single unfavorable result from the floods of last week.

The Ohio River is a great artery of commerce, made so by nature. It is in length about 1,000 miles, and drains a territory of approximately 210,000 square miles. Its varied mineral resources are the principal sources of its great wealth, and they are being constantly developed. In the report of the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army for 1896 iron, glass, pottery, lumber, furniture, cotton, and woolens were enumerated as the principal manufactured products of that region. But since even that late date two more important commodities must be added to the list-paving brick and cement-the raw material to manufacture them being present in great abundance. Coal constitutes the greatest traffic on the river, although iron, paying brick, steel rails, cotton ties, sheet iron, wire, nails, and lumber are borne upon it in large quantities. The report of the Chief of Engineers just referred to is authority for the statement that "The coal traffic alone on this river is greater than all traffic on the Mississippi, if we except that which it receives from the Ohlo." Coal is transported on the river in barges towed by steamboats, and to illustrate the quantity that may be transported in this manner by one boat with its equipment of barges I will refer to a trip recently made by the steamer Sprague, which towed from Pittsburg to New Orleans at one trip 70,000 tons of coal at a cost of one-third of a mill per ton To transport this same quantity of coal by rail would have required 2,333 cars, composing a train 14 miles long, and the charge would have been 4.6 mills per ton per mile. Yet one boat with its barges and the river did the work as speedily as a railroad would have done it, without any loss whatever or danger to the life or limb of any human being. But coal is not all that this river carries. Tons and tons of paving brick, iron, lumber, and grain are transported, besides a variety of lighter manufactured articles. The commerce of the Ohio River for 1905, as shown by the reports made according to the act of February 21, 1891, amounted to 13,163,656 tons, but these figures do not take into consideration timber and possibly some other commodities. During the same period 4,193,971 passengers were carried.

And this brings me to a consideration of one of the arguments I wish to make in favor of the continued improvement of the Ohio River. I have shown you that great tonnage can be transported upon it with comparative ease. This is obvious, of course, in Lake and ocean traffic, but I have given you a fact with respect to the river sufficient to establish the rule. The next inquiry should be as to the cost of such transportation.

That the carriage of freight on the Lakes is at a much less cost than by rail is well known by all who are familiar with such matters, but to give you an actual instance I will quote from the address delivered at Minneapolis last October by the distinguished Representative from Louisiana, Hon. Joseph E. Ransbell, who, by the way, has endeared himself in the hearts of the people of the Ohio Valley more than any other man now living south of the Ohio River. We all honor him and admire his energy, manliness, and learning. In discussing rates between Pittsburg and Northern Lake ports by way of Lake Erie, he said:

Pittsburg sends a lot of coal out to this country. It is shipped from Pittsburg to these same ports on Lake Erie, Conneaut and Ashtabula. It is shipped 135 miles by rail at 90 cents per ton; that is the standard rate. When it reaches the steamers, they charge to carry it to Chicago, Milwaukee, or Duluth, the Lake ports of the country, 35 cents per ton. The rail rate is 90 cents per ton for 135 miles and the water rate 35 cents for 1,000 miles. The railroad rate is exactly 2,000 per cent higher.

That statement is a fact, but the comparison will not hold out in all cases, because, coming in the other direction, the same lake boats charge 80 cents per ton for carrying ore from Duluth to Conneaut as against 35 cents per ton for carrying coal back. The principal object of those lake freight lines is to carry ore, not coal, and all they can make in returning coal is that much found. But the illustration is apt and establishes the fact. Another illustration is the following from the report of the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army for 1906, at page 509:

No estimate can be given of the effect of the improvement thus far made on freight rates. The comparative rates between Pittsburg, Pa., and Memphis, Tenn., by rail and by river were estimated in 1903 as follows:

	Pittsburg-Memphis
	Miles.	Per ton.
Soft coal: By railroad By steamboat	807 1,218	$3.73 .42

Now, the railroad rate does not always meet the water rate. The rule is to meet it if possible. And this must be so. railroads can not haul as cheaply as boats can transport, because they have roadbeds to keep up, the ties must be renewed, stations maintained, equipment kept up, new rails laid, damages caused by wrecks paid, and a great expense in many items incurred to which boats are not subject. But the water rate does affect and regulate the railroad rate, both on the Lakes and the river. During the marvelous growth of our country—and this is the point I am coming at—our railways have not been able to keep pace with our industrial development. Their revenues and resources have not been sufficient to enable them to acquire the necessary expensive terminals in large cities, to lay down double tracks, to rebuild bridges, and to reduce grades and The business man complains because he can not get all the cars he wants, keep them as long as he wants to, and because his freight is not moved as rapidly as is desirable. our great inland waterways are improved, the Lakes, the Ohio and the Mississippi rivers, and canals connecting these rivers with the Lakes are constructed, these natural highways will aid us in taking care of the heavy freights and will prove the most potent factor in solving the transportation problems now before the country. This is one of the reasons why I favor increased Federal expenditures for river and harbor purposes.

It has been pointed out that the traffic on the rivers does not equal in tonnage the traffic on the Lakes. But that is no reason why the rivers should not be improved. The tonnage on the Lakes was not what it is now before the Lakes were improved. The report I have referred to well states the case in the following language:

The nature of the Ohio River is such that its improvement, whether by canalization (locks and dams) or open channel, can not bring full benefit to navigation interests until the improvement shall have become more continuous than past appropriations have permitted. The unimproved portions afford less depth of channel than the improved sections and limit the available draft for the whole river to that required for passing its shoalest parts.

The fact that the special report on the Ohio River made by the Chief of Engineers in his report for 1896 shows that the arrival of steamers at Cincinnati has decreased from 3,163 for the year 1879-80 to 1,028 for the year 1895 has been used as an argument against the improvement of the river and to show that the river boats have been driven out of the trade by the railroads. I do not so understand it. The railroads will, to be sure, monopolize the passenger traffic, but the heavy freights they can not, on account of the cost of carriage, if a reasonable boating stage can be maintained in the river. I account for this falling off of river traffic in a different manner. Strange as it may seem, the same causes which produce the floods in the Ohio River are partially responsible, at least, for continued low water during the late summer and early fall seasons. Formerly the immense territory drained by the Ohio was covered with Much of this territory is mountainous. When the forests existed the rainfall did not find its way into the river as The accumulation of leaves and débris rapidly as it does now. from the forests served to restrain the rainfall so that much of it was absorbed by the soil or evaporated and the remainder gradually found its way into the river. In that way sudden rises were uncommon and the rainfall, reaching the river more gradually, not only prevented floods, but maintained a higher stage of water in the river during a greater period of time than now. But the forests in recent years have been removed. Much of the timber has been cut from the hillsides, so that the rainfall upon reaching the surface of the ground finds but slight opposition upon its course to the river. Instead of entering the river gradually, it comes with a rush, is soon gone, and the result is that a more even stage is not maintained. The construction of dams would conserve this supply and a boating stage could be maintained the year round.

I might advance other arguments upon this proposition, but my time is limited and I desire to direct attention to some other points.

I had intended to say something on the character of the work that has been done and that which is in prospect, but in looking up the facts I find the following in the Report of the Chief of Engineers for 1906:

Engineers for 1906:

Pursuant to a requirement in section 1 of the river and harbor act approved March 3, 1905, a board of engineers has been appointed to examine the Ohio River and report, at the earliest date by which a thorough examination can be made; the necessary data with reference to the canalization of the river and the approximate location and number of locks and dams in such river, with a view both to a depth of 6 feet and 9 feet, and to include the probable cost of such improvement with each of the depths named, the probable cost of maintenance, and the present and prospective commerce of said river, etc.; also to examine the said river from the mouth of the Green River to Cairo, with a view to determining whether an increased depth can be maintained by the use of dredges. The board's report will be duly submitted when received.

I understand that this report has been completed for some time, but is not yet submitted to Congress or available for examination. Accordingly a discussion of the subject-matter treated therein should be left for a future occasion.

It will cost about $60,000,000 to complete the work now recommended, and I would urge larger annual appropriations for that purpose. If we do not make more rapid progress, the generation of to-day will not see the work completed, but with public sentiment aroused as it is to the necessities of our country for more adequate and cheaper transportation for heavy freights and with the benefits that will accrue from the improvements provided for by this bill, apparent to all, we may expect to see that opinion reflected in Congress, and the results will be appreciably felt at no distant date.

We are now pouring out millions of dollars to construct the Isthmian Canal. Its necessity is apparent to all. When constructed it will connect the Atlantic coast with the Pacific. Steamships can then compete with our transcontinental railways. But what about the great interior of our country—Pennsylvania, Michigan, Ohio, Illinois, West Virginia, Kentucky, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, Mississippi, Tennessee, Arkansas, Louisiana? Are they not to partake of the benefits of this great enterprise as well as the States on the coast? With the improvement of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, the central and southern portion of our country will be able to enjoy the same benefits of the Isthmian Canal that the coast States will enjoy, and our products of iron and steel, our paving and fire brick, cement, pottery, cotton, and a variety of other manufactured articles will find new markets ready for them.

From these facts I would deduce the following conclusions: The improvement of the Ohio River by canalization and the establishment of the 9-foot stage will give the people of the Central and Southern States lower freight rates for their heavy raw materials. It will give these States the same advantages that are now enjoyed in that respect by the States bordering on the Lakes and the coasts. There will be no difficulty in transporting the commerce of the country, because, with our natural highways of commerce doing their share of the work, railroad equipment can be used for the transportation of more valuable and less bulky freight, and the sections of the country now suf-fering for better transportation facilities can be cared for with comparative ease if the waterways do their share of the work. New markets will be opened up to our industries and the good that will come from this improvement will not be local merely, but general. For these reasons I favor pushing this work just as rapidly as our resources will permit.

The provisions of this bill carry an appropriation of $1,065,000 for the construction of lock and dam No. 26, near the mouth of the Kanawha River, near Gallipolis, Ohio. This is a most wise provision, as it will enable the coal fleets and other freight originating in the Kanawha River to reach the Ohio River at all times. It means much to the people living on the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, as it will prove a most important factor in the transportation of coal, in preventing coal famines, and in keeping down the freight rate on coal and consequently its price to the domestic consumer and manufacturer. The committee deserves great praise for this wise piece of legislation and the people of the Ohio Valley will recognize it and appreciate it. The tonnage originating upon the Kanawha River is large, amounting to 1,613,889 tons in 1905, of which 1,460,680 tons were coal. The construction of lock and dam No. 26 will not only prevent delay in the movement of this coal into the Ohio, but will materially aid navigation in the Ohio itself. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. How much time does the gentleman from Missouri desire?

Mr. RHODES. Ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for ten min-

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, I ask not the indulgence of the House at this late hour that I have anything to offer, either as criticism of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors or of its distinguished chairman. I have nothing to offer at this time upon the subject of deep waterways in general, except I am in favor of the proposition; but I do wish to call the attention of the House to a situation in my district with which I am familiar—a situation about which I profess to know something in the hope that this body may be induced to permit certain provisions of the bill to be modified by an amendment which I visions of the bill to be modified by an amendment which is shall offer at the proper time. There are three counties in the district I have the honor to represent bordering on the great Mississippi River. The situation in these counties is that this stretch of the river has been found hard to control. By virtue of the very nature of things this stretch of the river may be more difficult to control than other portions of the river; but I take it, Mr. Chairman, if the right thing is to be done by the Mississippi River, along with the other great rivers of the country, we must meet the situation as it is, as we find it, and not, perhaps, as it ought to be.

I say I have not one word of criticism to offer against the action of this committee or its distinguished chairman; and I want to say, too, I am not in sympathy with the course that has been pursued by some of the people of the city of St. Louis and by some of the great newspapers of that city and of the State of Illinois in their criticism of the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. [Applause.] A man whose heart is right and whose head is clear should never be made the object of an assault such as has been directed against Mr. Burron, the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, by the great newspapers of my State and of our sister State, the great State of Illinois, take it, gentlemen, this is not the best way to get results. agree with those who criticise the committee as to what we want, but disagree with them in method. I do not believe for one moment the chairman of this great committee has purposely discriminated against the people of the Mississippi Valley or against the people of the great Commonwealth of Missouri. do disagree with the committee, however, as to the manner in which it is proposed to improve the stretch of the river to which I refer. I am about to digress from the point to which I wish to invite the attention of the House.

I have been informed by the chairman of this committee that for improvement purposes the river has been divided into three sections, and that section in which I live is the stretch between the mouth of the Ohio and the mouth of the Missouri. My object in calling the attention of the committee to this stretch of the river is this: Under the river and harbor act of 1905 the only method by which this stretch of the river can be improved is by dredging, and it is my judgment, and it is the judgment of constituents of mine, that the method of dredging that stretch of the river has not been a success. It is my opinion, and it is the opinion of well-informed constituents of mine, that the method of improvement by fascines, by revetments, by riprap, and by the building of dikes and other methods of bank improvement has been far more successful than dredging; and for that reason, when the time comes, Mr. Chairman, I hope that the distinguished gentleman from Ohio and the House will permit me to amend the bill in such a way as to expend the $750,000 carried in the bill for bank improvement and the $250,000 for dredging, rather than in the manner indicated on pages 72, 73, and 74 of the pending bill.

I have in mind a certain point on the Mississippi River in Perry County, Mo., which is known as "Belgique Landing." At this point the channel of this great river has divided itself into three chutes, and if the channel was confined where it properly belongs, instead of its having been converted into three distinct streams, there would be only one channel. That part of the channel next to the Missouri shore is known as the "Mis-souri chute," the middle channel as the "middle chute," and the stream on the Illinois side is known as the "Illinois chute." By a continuation of the fence which was begun prior to the act of 1905 across the Belgique chute to the island separating the middle and Missouri chutes the Belgique Landing would be safely protected. As it now is all the dredge boats on the Mississippi River can not prevent the inundation and washing away of Belgique. By building a similar fence on the Illinois side the entire volume of water would then be confined in the middle chute, where it naturally belongs, and the channel thus confined could be depended upon to do its own dredging. Missouri side, practically all the way down from St. Louis to the city of Ste. Genevieve, is a rock shore, while on the Illinois side they have soft alluvial banks. These banks easily erode, and the result is, on account of the erosion of the banks on the Illinois side and on account of the great amount of sediment that is being precipitated in this part of the Mississippi River, which is just south of the mouth of the Missouri, this part of the river is difficult to control. It should be remembered that the Missouri River carries perhaps a greater amount of sediment in solution than any other river in the United States; and as a matter of philosophy, when the water of the Missouri comes into contact with the water of the Mississippi, there is a tendency to precipitation. Hence the building up of the bed of the river, which, with the erosion of the Illinois banks, causes the water to be drawn away from the Missouri side and the formation of bars and islands along our shore.

I have some correspondence here that came to me from General Mackenzie, of the War Department, and it is under the jurisdiction of the War Department that the improvement of this stretch of the river comes. In this correspondence it was stated by General Mackenzie on the 31st day of last March, in a letter from him to me, under the river and harbor act of 1905 no money was available for improving this stretch of the river except by dredging. I here wish to call attention to paragraph 2 of the letter. You will observe by reading paragraph 2 of General Mackenzie's letter the entire plan of river improvement for this stretch of the river was altered by the act of March 3, 1905. It is to this method I object.

GENERAL MACKENZIE'S LETTER.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, March 31, 1996.

Hon. M. E. Rhodes. United States House of Representatives.

Hon. M. E. Rhodes.

United States House of Representatives.

Sir: Referring to petition from Mr. Ed. Zeller and others, that steps be taken to secure a diversion of a part of the appropriation made in the last river and harbor act for the Mississippi River, to be applied to protection of the landing at Brickeys, otherwise known as Cliff Landing, between Ste. Genevieve and Crystal City, and the protection of Randolph and Monroe counties, Ill. or that a separate appropriation be secured for the purpose, I have the honor to inform you that I am to-day in receipt of a report on the subject from Maj. Thomas L. Casey, Corps of Engineers, the district engineer, of which a copy is inclosed. It will be seen that in Major Casey's opinion it is desirable that the diversion asked or a special appropriation be made for the work.

2. You are undoubtedly aware of the fact that the river and harbor act approved March 3, 1905, altered the adopted project for the Mississippi River between the mouth of the Ohio and the mouth of the Missouri River by providing that future prosecution of the improvement be by dredging, leaving no funds available for permanent works, except a portion of the balance then remaining on hand to the credit of the improvement. It will therefore require Congressional action to secure such diversion as is the desire of your petitioners, and beyond stating the facts to you, as I have done, it is not in my power to render assistance.

3. The petition is returned herewith.

Very respectfully,

Brigadicr-General, Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

I here wish to state I received a petition, signed by numerous

I here wish to state I received a petition, signed by numerous citizens residing in my district, setting out a certain situation on the river at Cliff Landing. I wish to ask permission to insert this petition in the RECORD, and will not take the time of the House to read it.

PETITION.

Hon. M. E. RHODES, Washington D. C.

Sig.: The undersigned, your constituents, beg leave to call your attention to a grievance which, unless promptly remedied, may lead to very serious consequences affecting their interests and the interests of a large part of the people of Sie. Genevieve County and adjoining counties. The black print hereto attached, which is made from original surveys on file in the St. Louis office of the United States Engineer Department, in charge of river improvements, will best illustrate the situation.

Brickeys, or Cliff Landing, situated on the Mississippi River about midway between the city of Ste. Genevieve, Ste. Genevieve County, and Crystal City, in Jefferson County, has been for over sixty years one of the best known and safest landings on the western bank of the Mississippi River between Cairo and St. Louis. It is used very extensively for shipment by farmers, merchants, and manufacturers of those counties. The channel of the river originally ran close to the Missouri shore for many miles north and south of that landing, but a bar forming many years ago a few miles above the landing developed into what is now known as "Ames Island," a low sand island, overgrown with willows. After the formation of this island the channel still continued along the eastern edge of it until about 1897 and came to the Missouri shore some distance above Morrison Hollow, shown on the attached map. River men uniformly assert that there never was, even at the lowest stages of the river, less than 20 feet of water in this channel between the place where it struck the Missouri bluff and thence for several miles downward.

About six or seven years ago the channel began to sheer off from the lower point of Ames Island southeastwardly toward the Illinois shore, and the United States engineers, in order to prevent the river from cutting into the alluvial soil on the opposite shore in Illinois, constructed a revetment on its eastern bank at Penitentiary Point, about 2½ miles above Brickeys. This revetment, owing to a failure of appropriations to keep similar structures in thorough repair, was permitted to full into decay, and the high water of succeeding years tore away the lower end of it, in consequence of which the Mississippi washed away several hundred acres of very valuable land in a high state of cultivation in Randolph County, Ill., and the deep channel shifted to the Illinois shore. What was the bed of the river in and prior to 1900, as the annexed plat will show, is now a sand bar, rapidly extending southwardly and threatening to destroy the landing at Brickeys entirely.

The main channel of the river has shifted so far eastward that it southwardly and threatening to destroy the landing at Brickeys entirely.

The main channel of the river has shifted so far eastward that it is but a very short distance from a levee constructed by the people of Randolph and Monroe counties, in Illinois, at great expense, and protecting the bottom lands along the river for a distance of 40 miles and more. Should the river seriously cut this levee, as it is now threatening to do, these lands are liable to be inundated to the extent of several hundred thousand acres at every high stage of the river, to the incalculable damage of their owners and inhabitants.

The construction placed by the Attorney-General's office upon the river and harbor appropriation act of 1904-5 confines the United States Engineer's office to an improvement of the river by dredging, and prevented the use of any part of the money appropriated for the preservation of landings, or even for the repair of work that had already been done. The dredging has accomplished very little good, while permitting the protecting structures along the river banks to go to decay has, as the foregoing will show, caused great injury, not only to ancient and well-established landings, but also irreparable injury to people living in the bottom lands adjoining the river.

The United States engineer department in St. Louis replies to repeated complaints made to Major Casey, who is in charge of it, that there is no money available under present appropriations to remedy this state of affiairs, which the department concedes is deplorable.

The undersigned therefore earnestly request you to confer without delay with the Hon. W. A. Rodenberg, M. C., whose constituents are vitally interested in this matter, in order to secure either a diversion of part of the appropriation made for dredging in the last river and harbor bills to the protection of the landing at Brickeys, and the incidental protection of hundreds of thousands of acres in the opposite bottoms of Illinois, or else try to secure a separate appropriation for that that purpose. All the facts hereinbefore stated can be verified by inquiry of Major

MAJOR CASEY'S REPORT.

MARCH 29, 1906.

Brig, Gen. A. Mackenzie, Chief of Engineers, United States Army, Washington, D. C.

Chief of Engineers, United States Army, Washington, D. C.

GENERAL: 1. In response to instructions contained in the first indorsement, office of the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, March 19, 1906, on the letter of Ed. Zeller et al. to the Hon. M. E. Rhodes (E. D., file 50524-1), petitioning that steps be taken to secure funds for the protection of the landing on the Mississippi River at Brickey, Mo., and of Randolph and Monroe counties, Ill., I have the honor to make the following report:

2. Examination and survey of the locality were made on March 23 and 24, 1906, the results of which are shown on the accompanying map.

3. Brickey Mill has been for many years a principal shipping point for the citizens of that part of Ste. Genevieve County, Mo., and has been accessible to steamers by reason of the deep-water channel past the landing at all navigable seasons of the year.

4. Much work in bank protection and channel contraction has been done by this office in that vicinity, and the extension of those works and the construction of others were in plan when their execution was interrupted by the terms of the river and harbor act of the last Congress.

5. For several years past the erosion of the right bank along Ames Island and the growing bar below it have caused deflection of the channel to the Illinois shore, which in turn has suffered such rapid and destructive erosion below the revetment at Penitentiary Point as to greatly widen the river there and draw the channel permanently away from Brickey, tending to the silting up of the depths that formerly obtained along the Missouri shore and to the ultimate extension downstream of the upper bar, to cover and destroy the landing.

6. The construction of the proposed hurdles at Penitentiary Point, as marked upon the map, No. 1 the first season and No. 2 the second, at an estimated cost of $75,000, would materially correct the excessive width of the river at this place, would cause an erosion of the threatening Missouri bar, would restore the channel to its former location in the vicinity of Brickey, and would virtually extend the bank protection already placed at Penitentiary Point by preventing further erosion of the Illinois bank below it, and thus preserve the important levee at present threatened.

7. As the small balance of funds remaining on hand from former appropriations for works of permanent improvement is not sufficient to warrant the construction of new works, and will probably be soon entirely expended in the repair and maintenance of those already begun, it is respectfully recommended that Congress be urged to grant authority for the use of a portion of the last appropriation for dredging—as one-half of the unallotted and unexpended balance on hand, which would amount to about $85,000—to the construction of these hurdles and such other work in the district as may be similarly urgent and beneficial to the interests of navigation, or else to grant a special appropriation for this work.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

Major*, Corps of Engineers*, United States Army*.

I wish to ask the House to observe that Major Casey in his

I wish to ask the House to observe that Major Casey in his report sustains the contention set out in the petition of my constituents. Hence I hold my position to-day, for more bank-protection work ought to be done along this stretch of the river. In further proof that my point ought to be well taken at this time I wish to recall that the distinguished chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee himself, at the last session of Congress, as a result of this showing, acceded to our wishes and permitted a bill to pass this body granting an appropriation of $150,000 for temporary relief at certain points on this stretch of the river.

Further down on the river, at Ste. Genevieve, we find the situation of things: Ste. Genevieve is not only the oldest town in Missouri, but is one of the most beautiful little cities on the Mississippi from its mouth to its source. At Ste. Genevieve, I was about to say, the old boat landing, on account of a great bar and an island having been formed in the river, has been completely destroyed, and to-day the landing is more than 1 mile north of the city.

The fact is the city of Ste. Genevieve no longer boasts of her old-time boat landing, but instead has stretched out before her a ragged island. I call attention to this matter to show the shifting nature of the channel of the river here and to urge more liberal appropriations. South of the city of Ste. Genevieve the situation changes. We have on our side the alluvial banks, and on the Illinois side is the rock shore. The tendency here is for the river to inundate and wash away the Missouri shore; consequently our people suffer great loss and navigation is greatly interfered with.

I said I was not going to criticise the committee and I shall not; but while the gentleman from Ohio, who has just preceded me, was speaking, I was caused to turn to page 55 of the pending bill. There I began by reading, "$450,000 for the improvement of the Ohio River." I then read on down to the bottom of the next page, and then to the bottom of the next page, and on down to line 20 on page 58. I read all this time about nothing but various items of appropriation for the Ohio River. have made the figures and see the aggregate amount provided for in this bill for the improvement of the Ohio is $4,129,111.

I could not help but think, as I listened to the gentleman from Ohio tell of the grandeur of his State and of the great volume of commerce transported over the Ohio River last year, that if the Mississippi had only had the attention the Ohio has had, possibly we could to-day boast a better commerce and not be estopped in our demands for greater appropriations for our river by the argument that we have no "boats on the river; no commerce."

If I have not forgotten my geography, the Missouri River is a greater stream than the Ohio. I mean it is greater in length, width, and in volume of water, yet from its mouth to Fort Benton there is but $300,000 appropriated. One hundred and fifty thousand to be expended in pulling snags out of the river between St. Louis and Kansas City.

But, Mr. Chairman, we are tickled to death to get this amount, as it has been so many years since the Missouri River has been recognized at all. In fact, it has only been since my good friend and colleague, Mr. Ellis, came to Congress from Kansas City that the Missouri River has gotten on the map.

We say all honor is due the distinguished Kansas City Congressman for what he has done in one short period of two years. It is my opinion, if the people of Kansas City continue to show their good judgment and keep their present Member of Congress here for a long period of time, at some future day we may have the pleasure of even seeing large appropriations not only for the Mississippi but the Missouri River as well. I infer from the reading of the various items in the bill relating to the improvement of the Ohio that this stream has almost been converted into a canal from mouth to source. For instance, I see $70,000 is appropriated for improvement at Lock No. 6; $198,000 is appropriated at Lock No. 11. Large sums are appropriated for improvements at Locks Nos. 8, 13, 18, and 26, and at various other places on the river. As I said before, an aggregate appropriation of $4,129,111 for the Ohio River. But I have promised not to complain, and shall be reasonably satisfied if permitted to amend the bill as already indicated.

In conclusion permit me to say I am for more liberal river appropriations. I am for a deep waterway from Gulf to I really believe the day is coming when the Mississippi Lakes. and all its great tributaries must be improved. I believe with the building of the Panama Canal must come the deep waterway from Gulf to Lakes. I believe the dream of the ages will not have been fully realized in the matter of waterway im-provement and water transportation until the completion of the Panama Canal and the transformation of the Mississippi River from Gulf to Lakes into a deep waterway. It will then be that St. Louis can truly be called "the new city of Athens," about which Spanish adventurers and explorers dreamed and philosophized in the seventeenth century.

Again shall Athens bid her columns rise, Again her lofty turrets reach the skies. Science again shall find a safe retreat, And commerce here in a center meet At St. Louis.

[Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. RHODES. I ask permission to insert in the RECORD the correspondence to which I referred, from the War Department, in relation to this situation of the river.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. HALE. From what committee does this bill come, Mr.

President?
The VICE-PRESIDENT. It comes with a favorable report from the Committee on the Judiciary.
Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I will say that it is a bill which was unanimously reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, as I remember it. It passed the Senate at the last session; that is to say, substantially in its present form it passed at the last session. The Senator will recall the circumstance of what is known as the "leakage" in the Department of Agriculture on the subject of the prospective yield or production. Agriculture on the subject of the prospective yield or production of cotton in the United States. This bill is intended particularly to cover that point, and I hope the Senator from Maine will not object to it.

PENSIONS ON ACCOUNT OF INDIAN WARS.

The bill (S. 2887) granting increase of pensions to soldiers and widows of the Indian wars, under the acts of July 27, 1892, and June 27, 1902, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was read.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, we have never legislated on pension bills of any kind, I think, certainly not of late years, granting arrears, and I move to strike out that provision.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from New Hampshire that the committee has reported an amendment to that portion of the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the committee recommends such an amendment, very well.

Mr. KEAN. If there is a report accompanying that bill, I ask that it may be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is a report, which will be

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. Gearin May 28, 1906, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (8, 2887) granting increase of pensions to soldiers and widows of the Indian wars, under the acts of July 27, 1892, and June 27, 1902, have examined the same and report:

This bill as amended proposes to amend the acts of July 27, 1892, and June 27, 1902, by increasing the amounts allowed to survivors of the Indian wars, mentioned in those acts, from $8 to $10 per month. From the evidence submitted to your committee it appears that there are about 5,000 survivors of these wars, and inasmuch as the wars occurred prior to 1856 it is self-evident that the survivors have now reached an advanced age which precludes their earning a living by manual labor. The passage of the bill is therefore recommended when amended as follows:

In line 8 strike out the word "twelve" and insert in lieu thereof the word "ten;" and in line 8, after the word "month," strike out the comma and insert in lieu thereof a period, and strike out the word "beginning" and strike out the entire line 9, making the bill read as follows:

comma and insert in field thereof a period, and state of the signing and strike out the entire line 9, making the bill read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of every pensioner who is now on the roll, or may hereafter be placed on the roll, under the acts of July 27, 1892, and June 27, 1992, to $10 per month.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twelve" and insert "ten;" and in the same line, after the word "month," to strike out "beginning June 27, 1902;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of every pensioner who is now on the roll, or may hereafter be placed on the roll, under the acts of July 27, 1892, and June 27, 1902, to $10 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

At the time when this bill was under consideration some days since, while he was in favor of the principle embodied in the bill, he believed that the State has jurisdiction in this respect over forest reservations, and that it is therefore unnecessary to pass the bill. free delivery offices was announced as next in order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill has heretofore been read and amended.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask if that is the bill to which I offered an amendment relating to the rural-delivery carriers which was agreed to?

Mr. CLAY. The bill comes from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads with a favorable report, and I believe the Senator from New Hampshire offered an amendment so as to include rural free-delivery carriers, fixing their salaries at

Mr. GALLINGER. I did; and it is in the bill now. Mr. CLAY. I understand that the principal features of this bill have been incorporated in the post-office appropriation bill now pending in the House, and I am sure that the entire subject will be discussed when the post-office appropriation bill comes to the Senate committee. I think it probably best that this bill should wait until action is taken on the post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. KEAN. Then let it go over.
Mr. CLAY. I will ask that it may go over. I favor, however, the principles set forth in the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator from Georgia, be-fore it goes over, if there is no objection to the bill, and it will take but a moment, would it not be well for the Senate to put itself on record in its favor?

Mr. CLAY. I have no objection to that course.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very well. Then let the bill be put on its passage. It has been read and amended.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. CLAY. The amendment proposed by the Senator from

New Hampshire was agreed to?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PHILIP LONEY.

The bill (S. 2781) for the relief of Philip Loney was announced as next in order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will call the attention of the Senate to the fact that there is a similar House bill upon the Calendar.

Mr. KEAN. May I have a part of the report read in this case? I only want to see if I can call to mind what the bill is.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report accompanying the House bill has not yet been returned from the Printer. Mr. KEAN. But let just a few words of the first part of the report accompanying the Senate bill be read. I am rather familiar with all these bills, and I think I can recall it if I hear the first part of the report read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as re quested.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report submitted by Mr. CLAPP, from the Committee on Claims, June 12, 1906.

Mr. KEAN. The Secretary need not read further. Let the House bill be considered instead of the Senate bill. I remember the case perfectly now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The message referred to is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

PUBLIC-LAND LAWS.

The message referred to is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

PUBLIC-LAND LAWS.

The developments of the past year emphasize with increasing force the need of vigorous and immediate action to recast the public-land laws and adapt them to the actual situation. The timber and stone act has demonstrated conclusively that its effect is to turn over the public timber lands to great corporations. It has done enormous harm. It is no longer needed, and it should be repealed.

The desert-land act results so frequently in fraud and so comparatively seldom in making homes on the land that it demands radical amendment. That provision which permits assignment before patent should be repealed, and the entryman should be required to live for not less than two years at home on the land before patent issues. Otherwise the desert-land law will continue to assist speculators and other large holders to get control of land and water on the public domain by indefensible means.

The commutation clause of the homestead act serves in a majority of cases to defeat the purpose of the homestead act serves in a majority of cases to defeat the purpose of the homestead act stell, which is to facilitate settlement and create homes. In theory the commutation clause should assist the honest settler, and doubtless in some cases it does so. Far more often it supplies the means by which speculators and loan and mortgage companies secure possession of the land. Actual, not constructive, living at home on the land for three years should be required before commutation unless it should appear wiser to repeal the commutation clause altogether.

These matters are more fully discussed in the Report of the Public Lands Commission, to which I again call your attention.

I am gravely concerned at the extremely unsatisfactory condition of the public-land laws and at the prevalence of fraud under their present provisions. For much of this fraud the present laws are chiefly responsible. There is but one way by which the fraudulent acquis

RIGHTS OF WAY AND PRIVILEGES.

Many of the existing laws affecting rights of way and privileges on public lands and reservations are illogical and unfair. Some work injustice by granting valuable rights in perpetuity without return. Others fail to protect the grantee in his possession of permanent improvements made at large expense. In fairness to the Government, to the holders of rights and privileges on the public lands, and to the people whom the latter serve, I urge the revision and reenactment of these laws in one comprehensive act, providing that the regulations and the charge now in force in many cases may be extended to all, to the end that unregulated or monopolistic control of great natural resources may not be acquired or misused for private ends.

PRIVATE HOLDINGS WITHIN NATIONAL FORESTS.

natural resources may not be acquired or misused for private ends.

PRIVATE HOLDINGS WITHIN NATIONAL FORESTS.

The boundaries of the national forest reserves unavoidably include certain valuable timber lands not owned by the Government. Important among them are the land grants of various railroads. For more than two years negotiations with the land-grant railroads have been in progress looking toward an arrangement by which the forest on railroad lands within national forest reserves may be preserved by the removal of the present crop of timber under rules prescribed by the Forest Service, and its perpetuation may be assured by the transfer of the land to the Government without cost. The advantage of such an arrangement to the Government lies in the acquisition of lands whose protection is necessary to the general welfare. The advantage to the railroads is found in the proposal to allow them to consolidate their holdings of timber within forest reserves by exchange after deeding their lands to the Government and thus to cut within a limited time solid bodies of timber instead of alternate sections, although the amount of timber in each case would be the same. It is possible that legislation will be required to authorize this or a similar arrangement with the railroads and other owners. If so, I recommend that it be enacted.

WORKING CAPITAL FOR THE NATIONAL FORESTS.

WORKING CAPITAL FOR THE NATIONAL FORESTS

Working capital for the National forests now reserved for the use and benefit of the people exceeds considerably the sum of one thousand million dollars. The stumpage value of the standing timber approaches $700,000,000,000, and together with the range and timber lands, the water for irrigation and power, and the subsidiary values, reaches an amount equal to that of the national property now under the immediate control of the Army and Navy together. But this vast domain is withheld from serving the nation as freely and fully as it might by the lack of capital to develop it. The yearly running expenses are sufficiently met by the annual appropriation and the proceeds of the forests. Under the care of the Forest Service the latter are increasing at the rate of more than half a million dollars a year. The estimate of appropriation for the present year is less than for last year, and it is confidently expected that by 1910 the Forest Service will be entirely self-supporting. In the meantime there is the most urgent need for tralls, fences, cabins for the rangers, bridges, telephone lines, and the other items of equipment without which the reserves can not be handled to advantage, can not be protected properly, and can not contribute as they should to the general welfare. Expenditures for such permanent improvements are properly chargeable to capital account. The lack of reasonable working equipment weakens the protection of the national forests and greatly limits their production. This want can not be supplied from the appropriation for running expenses. The need is urgent. Accordingly I recommend that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to advance to the Forest Service, upon the security of the standing timber, an amount, say $5,000,000,000, sufficient to provide a reasonable working capital for the national forests, to bear interest and to be repaid in annual installments beginning in ten years.

TRANSFER OF THE NATIONAL PARKS. TRANSFER OF THE NATIONAL PARKS.

The national parks of the West are forested, and they lie without exception within or adjacent to national forest reserves. Two years ago the latter were transferred to the care of the Secretary of Agriculture, with the most satisfactory results. The same reasons which led to this transfer make advisable a similar transfer of the national parks, now in charge of the Secretary of the Interior, and I recommend legislation to that end.

INDIAN LANDS.

Within or adjoining national forests are considerable areas of Indian lands of more value under forest than for any other purpose. It would aid greatly in putting these lands to their best use if the power to create national forests by proclamation were extended to cover them. The Indians should be paid the full value of any land thus taken for public purposes from the proceeds of the lands themselves, but such land should revert to the Indians if it is excluded from national forest use before full payment has been made.

TRANSFER OF THE NATIONAL PARKS.

Who control of graving in the patient forests is an assured success.

TRANSFER OF THE NATIONAL PARKS.

The control of grazing in the national forests an assured success. The condition of the range is improving rapidly, water is being developed, much feed formerly wasted is now saved and used, range controversies are settled, opposition to the grazing fee is practically at an end, and the stockmen are earnestly supporting the Forest Service and cooperating with it effectively for the improvement of the range.

The situation on the open Government range is strikingly different. Its carrying capacity has probably been reduced one-half by overgrazing and is still falling. Range controversies in many places are active and bitter, and life and property are often in danger. The interests both of the live-stock industry and of the Government are needlessly impaired. The present situation is indefensible from any point of view, and it should be ended.

I recommend that a bill be enacted which will provide for Government control of the public range through the Department of Agriculture, which alone is equipped for that work. Such a bill should insure to each locality rules for grazing specially adapted to its needs and should authorize the collection of a reasonable grazing fee. Above all, the rights of the settler and home maker should be absolutely guaranteed.

Much of the public land can only be used to advantage for grazing when fenced. Much fencing has been done for that reason, and also to prevent other stock owners from using land to which they have an equal right under the law. Reasonable fencing, which promotes the use of the range and yet interferes neither with settlement nor with other range rights, would be thoroughly desirable if it were legal. Yet the law forbids it, and the law must and will be enforced. I will see to it that the illegal fences are removed unless Congress at the present session takes steps to legalize proper fencing by Government control of the range.

THE WHITE HOUSE, December 17, 1906. Mr. HEYBURN. I also desire to insert as a part of my remarks the order of the President under date of January 25, modifying the order of December 13.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The order referred to is as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE, Washington, January 25, 1967.

The Secretary of the Interior.

Sir: To prevent the fraud now practiced in the acquisition of public lands of the United States, I have to direct that hereafter no final certificate, patent, or other evidence of title shall be issued under the public land laws until an actual examination has been made on the ground by an authorized officer of the Government; but the following shall be excepted from the force of this order:

(1) All claims which have heretofore been examined on the ground by an authorized officer of the Government whose report is found satisfactory.

by an authorized omicer of the development of the Government other isfactory.

(2) All claims where heretofore an officer of the Government other than officers authorized to take final proof shall have been present at the taking of final proof to cross-examine claimant and witnesses, if such proof is found satisfactory.

(3) All claims where claimant's compliance with law has been established by contest or other regular adverse proceedings.

(4) Entries which may have been confirmed by virtue of any act of Congress.

(4) Entries which may have been communed by the Congress.
(5) Selections and entries in which no residence or improvement is required by law, when the lands embraced therein are, strictly speaking, in agricultural districts, or when their character has been fixed by investigation and classification made in accordance with law.
(6) Cases of reissuance of patents because of some clerical error occurring in the patent heretofore issued.
(7) All Indian allotments which have been regularly approved in accordance with instructions of the Secretary of the Interior.

You will issue all necessary instructions to carry this order into effect.

This order is in lieu of my order of December 13, 1906.
THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, briefly I desire to call attention to the effect of the land policy, against which this resolution is directed, upon the rights of the States. I will take one State as an example of all of the States that are within the public-land area, known as "public-land States."

When Idaho was admitted to the Union it was given an absolute grant in præsenti of certain land. Idaho had adopted its constitution before applying for admission, and in the admission act of Congress that constitution was accepted and ratified expressly in terms; so that when Congress acted it knew exactly what the constitution of Idaho would be, and the provisions contained in the constitution of Idaho relative to the disposal of the public lands that should be given to the State by the Govern-With that knowledge Congress, in section 4 of the act, provided:

Sec. 4. That sections Nos. 16 and 36 in every township of said State, and where such sections or any parts thereof have been sold or otherwise disposed of by or under the authority of any act of Congress other lands equivalent thereto, in legal subdivisions of not less than one quarter section, and as contiguous as may be to the section in lieu of which the same is taken, are hereby granted to said State for the support of common schools, such indemnity lands to be selected within said State in such manner as the legislature may provide, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

There was first an absolute grant as to sections 16 and 36, and there was a provisional grant as to the indemnity or lieu lands. The language as it is applied to sections 16 and 36 constitutes a grant taking effect at the time of the enactment of the statute under which Idaho became a State. Congress, acting in the spirit of the constitution which was then before it, in section 5 provided:

Sec. 5. That all lands herein granted for educational purposes shall be disposed of only at public sale, the proceeds to constitute a permanent school fund, the interest of which only shall be expended in the support of said schools.

That provision was incorporated into the act because the constitution then before Congress contained a like provision as to the manner of the disposal of sections 16 and 36. It was intended when Idaho was admitted, with those provisions conferring grants of land upon the new State, that the Government of the United States would take all necessary steps to make the grant available. To grant lands to a State and then deliberately to bring about conditions under which the grant would be defeated would be unworthy of contemplation as an act of Con-To hold that the grant did not attach until the land was surveyed, as has been held in some cases where the language of the granting clause was different from that in the case of Idaho, does not answer the demand of the State of Idaho that the lands which were granted by the enabling act shall be de-livered by the Government to the State.

Many of our States received their grant of school lands under different terms than those which were embodied in the act admitting Idaho. As to many of the States it was said "there shall be granted sections 16 and 36"-" there shall be granted" those sections for school purposes; and the courts held in those cases that that was not a grant in præsenti, but that it was a grant subject to future conditions and subject to the survey and determination of the location of the lands. But in the case where Congress says "there is hereby granted to the State sections 16 and 36," the courts have held that that was such a grant as could not be afterwards taken from the State; that it was such a grant as passed present title to the State and forever severed any connection with or power on the part of the Government over those lands.

That question is directly involved in the message of the President of the United States. By Executive order the United States Government has taken possession of sections 16 and 36 to the extent of a million acres of the public school lands of the United States. Those public school lands have a minimum value under the law of $10 per acre; they have an aggregate value of $10,000,000. Public school lands of the United States have been taken possession of pursuant to an Executive order drawing the lines of forest reserve so as to include them. Ten million dollars of the public school funds of the United States, represented by those lands, have been seized by the Government, and the State jurisdiction and authority over those lands has been superseded under that Executive order by forest rangers and other appointive officers under the forestry provisions of the statutes.

Of course, the act of the Government in doing this is void. There can be no question of that. But should the Government of the United States be indulging in vold acts against the school funds of a State? They assume to rent these lands, to lease them for grazing purposes, to sell the timber from them, and dole out to the States an amount fixed not by contract between the Government and the State, but fixed by the will and the pleasure of one of the Departments of the Government alone. They say, "We will set aside for the States 10 per cent of the proceeds of the sale of public lands within the forest reserves for school and road purposes." They were granted to the State for school purposes, and not for road purposes. The constitu-tion of the State says that the proceeds or the income from these lands shall be read to the state of the state. these lands shall be used only for the maintenance of public schools; and yet the General Government, acting under Executive order and an interpretation of an unwise act of Congress, has taken possession of those lands—the school lands of the State—and are cutting the timber from them and selling it. They are leasing for grazing purposes the school lands of the State and disposing of the proceeds—90 per cent to themselves, 10 per cent to the State—with a direction as to the manner of the expenditure, notwithstanding that both the constitution of the State and the act admitting it as a State provide that these lands shall not be sold except at public auction, that they shall not be sold at a price less than $10 per acre, and that the proceeds shall be devoted exclusively to the public schools. There is the situation.

The message that we have before us proposes that not only shall this system be continued at the hands of the Executive power of the Government, but promises Congress that a request for an appropriation of $5,000,000 will be presented to us, and it has already been presented to us, for the purpose of enabling the Government to set up on a larger scale in this business of the sequestration and the exclusive control of State school lands. If the State appeals it must appeal to this tribunal that is committing the aggressive acts against the State's interest. If Congress shall deem it wise to substitute the judicial branch of the Government for the executive in determining and interpreting this law, then we will have an opportunity to determine the rights as between the State and the Government in an impartial judicial tribunal.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President—

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.
Mr. NEWLANDS. I understand the Senator to claim that in making these great reserves of forest lands school lands belonging to the State are included, and the result is a practical administration by the United States Government of lands belonging to the schools in the State.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; to the exclusion of the State. Mr. NEWLANDS. To the exclusion of the State.

Mr. HEYBURN. And nonproductive to the State.
Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to ask the Senator whether he believes the National Government should make these reserves in any degree; and if so, how would he shape the law so as to give the State its rights and the National Government its rights?

Mr. HEYBURN. I would not attempt to take private rights because it would be more convenient to have them. If the Government for the purpose of creating the State, and in consideration of the inducements which such a creation offers for the prosperity of the country, gave those school lands for that purpose, it does not lie in the power of any branch of the Government of the United States to diminish the estate which they gave to the State or embarrass it or encumber it. "The question of convenience suggested by the Senator from Nevada has been oft repeated to meet the suggestion I have just made in regard to the rights of the State, that it would be inconvenient, aye, impossible, for the Government of the United States to create these great baronial forest reserves in the State of Idaho, because, forsooth, the State of Idaho has vested rights there, and that therefore these vested rights must be disregarded in order that the policy and the convenience of the forest reservers may be conserved.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, granting all that the Senator says regarding the rights of States there and the injustice and the inadvisability of interfering at all with the State's rights, I would ask him whether it would be possible to make these reserves without including in their area in some degree the State lands? Has the Senator any suggestion to make—

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.
Mr. NEWLANDS (continuing). Regarding the creation of these reserves, or does he insist upon it that the possession by the State of a comparatively few acres of land within the area of the reserve should prevent the National Government from making any reserve at all?

Mr. HEYBURN. It should prevent the United States Government from making a reserve where it can not do so except at the expense of the State. But there are Territories and States in the United States where the grant of land was not such a one as severed the title of the United States from those lands. There a forest reserve can be created, whereas in States that I have in mind the language is "there shall be granted to the State" certain sections, as was the case during Territorial days. In the one case the United States Government retains the control over those lands, but where the grant was made absolute it does not.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Then I understand the Senator to contend that whilst it may be entirely proper to fix national reserves in other States, none whatever should be made in the State of

Mr. HEYBURN. None whatever should be made in the State of Idaho except in cooperation with the State itself, and the State itself can act only by legislative enactment, the constitution having conferred that power only upon the legislature.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Then I think the suggestion the Senator has made in that last sentence is a very wise one. I think we all want to have these reserves created. They may be too large in some instances

Mr. HEYBURN. That is, we want to have some reserves created.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes; and it does seem to me where the State has rights within the area of a great reserve there ought to be some kind of a negotiation between the two sovereigns, the State sovereign having the ownership and possession of certain land and the National Government having the ownership and possession of the rest. What I want to do is to get a prac-tical solution of the question in the interest of the entire country.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am ready to join with the Senator from Nevada to that end. At present the Government is paying tithes to the State of Idaho to the extent of 10 per cent of its profits from lands in which the Government has no interest whatever.

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator will permit me, I will make another suggestion. It seems to me it is about time that the Senators and Members from the West should get together, as they did upon the irrigation question years ago, and that they should present to their fellow-members in the Senate and House their recommendations upon this subject. As it is, there is the greatest degree of uncertainty in this country owing to land laws which are confessedly inadequate to the requirements of the West and which are confessedly inadequate to a just administration of the public domain.
Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I desire to incorporate in my remarks at this point a statement from the Land Office of the homestead entries and entries under other laws in the State of Idaho during the periods mentioned.

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, Mr. President, in the few minutes I have to speak before another order of business will be brought before the Senate, I desire to call attention to an expression in the message of the President, in which, in enumerating the pri-vate holdings included within forest reserves, he refers to those of the railroads but does not mention those lands which have been granted to schools or public institutions. He thinks Congress should take some notice and observe the rights of the railroads to their lands, and has overlooked the rights of the States and the public schools to their lands. I desire to call attention to that fact in considering the message.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President

The VICE-PRESIDENT. to the Senator from Utah? Does the Senator from Idaho yield

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.
Mr. SMOOT. I think in justice to the Bureau of Forestry the Senator ought to state that they are perfectly willing that the revenues coming from the school sections within any State shall be given to that State.

Mr. HEYBURN. They are willing? Mr. SMOOT. They are perfectly willing, and not only are they willing, but they are trying to transfer a body of land outside of the reserves, if the State will so select, equal to the number of acres of school sections within the reserves, so that the State may select public lands in lieu of their own.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to reply to that suggestion

We provided that the land should be sold only at public sale, and in no way can the title pass from the State of Idaho to those lands except by public auction, pursuant to the notice, as provided in the constitution. So any attempt on the part of the State officers to make a transfer or exchange of lands in order to solidify in large bodies these areas for the convenience either of the State or of the forest reservist, or for any other purpose, would be absolutely in violation of the admission act and of the constitution of the State. Mr. FULTON. Mr. President-

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. Mr. FULTON. I wish to ask a question of the Senator from Idaho and the Senator from Utah also. It is prompted by the suggestion of the Senator from Utah that the forest reservist is perfectly willing that the State shall have lands equivalent to the school lands. Is it important that they should be willing that the States should have these rights that really belong to them?

Mr. HEYBURN. In the minute and a half that remains to me I desire to say that it may seem very gracious on the part of the Government to allow us to participate to the extent of one-tenth in the benefit of the ownership by the States of this land, but we are unable to appreciate that generosity in the State of Idaho when we own the lands and are entitled to the entire benefit. While we may appreciate it to the extent of the 10 per cent which they give us, we would appreciate it very much more if they would withdraw from our property and allow us to enjoy it to the extent that Congress intended that the State should enjoy it when it was granted to it.

Mr. SMOOT rose. Mr. HEYBURN. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say that all the revenues from the forest reserves in all the Western States in the past have not been sufficient to pay the expenses for regulating them and managing them, and I believe the 10 per cent that has been refunded the States of the moneys collected by the Department amounts to more in dollars and cents than the State itself would have received if it had been managed and expenses paid in collecting not only the grazing taxes but the sale of timber as well.

I think as far as the Department is concerned in the past it has at least turned over to the State the amount received, exceeding the expenses, from the sale of timber and grazing within the borders of the reserve.

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, Mr. President, just a moment. In the State of Idaho last year the forest reservers turned over to the State less than $7,000, representing its 10 per cent. In other words, for the use of a million acres of the school lands of the State they paid us less than $7,000, and that $7,000 belonged to the State. It did not belong to the Government at all. It was not a gift. Not only did that $7,000 belong to the State, but a great many more thousands of dollars belonged to the State. It makes no difference how gracious this act of theirs may seem. I am directing my remarks to the question of the rights of the State. The State is quite competent to manage its own affairs. Young as it is it has proved itself to be competent, and we insist on having that privilege.

Now, Mr. President, because of the interruptions, which were all courteous and proper, I have been unable to entirely complete the remarks I intend to submit, but in a few more minutes at a subsequent time I will, with the consent of the Senate, do so. I will yield the floor for the order fixed for this hour, with the understanding that I will resume my remarks when the pending resolution is again the proper business for

Mr. NEWLANDS. I desire to give notice that when the Senator from Idaho concludes his remarks on Monday I will address the Senate on the pending resolution.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE SENATOR ARTHUR P. GORMAN.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, I submit the resolutions which I send to the desk, and ask for their adoption.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolutions.

The resolutions were read, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. Arthur Pue Gorman, late a Senator from the State of Maryland.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the business of the Senate be now suspended to enable his associates to pay proper tribute to his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, this is one of the many recurring occasions upon which this body is called together to pay tribute to the memory of its departed members. It is proper that these proceedings should take place because it seems to me that the dead are so soon forgotten now beyond the immediate circle that surrounds them, that it is well in cases where men in public life have been of service to their country that there should be some public reminder and memorial of their deeds. Senator Gorman was for a long time a distinguished figure here. He was, during the greater part of his political career, the recognized leader of the Democratic party in his State, and for some years its leader in the Nation, and it is entirely within the bounds to say that during all this time he exercised a commanding influence in the councils of his party, and by virtue of his long experience and sagacity occupied a most prominent position amongst its foremost men. He possessed to a remarkable degree the qualifications of political leadership.

The question is often asked, What are the constituent elements that constitute these qualifications? This is a difficult question to answer. Political leaders in a great degree re-semble all other leaders in the various walks of war and peace—in the professions, in literature, and in the ranks of commercial enterprise and business activity. They are born, not made. A man, if he has the talent for this vocation, may cultivate and develop it, but I have never believed that he could It is a peculiar gift that is made up of so many create it. parts that the absence of any one of them would fail to produce the whole. The entire combination in its natural and delicate proportions must exist in order to bring about the effect that is known as leadership. It is a power of mind and singularity of temperament united.

Senator Gorman, at an early age, appeared upon the political arena and he received his training from the masters of the art. His preceptors were the formidable chieftains of the earlier days who formulated great political principles and pioneered the way through the wilderness often without any guide or compass to direct them upon their journey. Party lines were then closely drawn, and the first lesson that Senator Gorman learned was the lesson of discipline. He carried it through life with him. It is very difficult for anyone to erase impressions that have thus been stamped upon him, and the instructions that we receive and the opinions we form and the convictions we acquire as our intellectual faculties are being developed, as a rule, become indelible in our maturer

Our political sentiments are generally bequeathed to us, and even our religious faith comes to us from the remotest ancestry. In our beliefs, as well as in our habits, we are often the subjects of a fate as unbending and inexorable as the laws of nature. Senator Gorman was trained in a school in which party loyalty was the alphabet and the curriculum and the test and passport for honor and promotion. He was naturally a man of positive purpose and of remarkable power of will, but he always believed in the doctrine that the party was greater than the individual, and if there was a difference of opinion it was the duty of the individual to surrender and sacrifice his own views at the altars of his party loyalty and allegiance. At the time when he first became prominently active in party affairs, all the great political leaders were imbued with these ideas and had been the disciples of that school. At present the political tide has changed and there is a vast body of independent voters in this country who fluctuate according to the men and measures that are presented to their suffrages.

Citizens with these proclivities work to a greater advantage in State and municipal politics than they do in national controversies, and we must all admit that their influence has been productive of the greatest good in the various communities in which they appear. One thing is certain, however, and that is, in time of heated party conflict a party to succeed must have discipline, organization, and leadership, and it was in the heat of party conflict that Senator Gorman exhibited his talents and accomplishments. When others became disconcerted he preserved his equanimity, and by his unruffled demeanor and his undisturbed self-possession infused courage and confidence among his followers, and at times when defeat seemed imminent and his supporters were discouraged and dismayed and his hosts were trembling, his gift of leadership appeared to the best advantage. He may have felt doubtful about the result; he may have clearly perceived that there was danger threatening, but if these thoughts occupied his mind, he never betrayed them, and he never disclosed them, even to those who were most intimately associated with him in the management of party. affairs.

If I could properly summarize what political leadership meant in his case, I would speak of it as follows: It meant the power to analyze the situation and not to be deceived by misleading appearances, and the faculty of discerning the true condition of public opinion. It carried with it necessarily a degree of personal magnetism that often turned his bitterest enemies into his warmest friends. It meant courage and judgment at critical periods and in the hour of emergency, and what is greater than all, it meant what I call, for the want of a better name, the genius of organization. This genius of organization is an endowment and not an acquirement. Some men of great force and intellect possess it, while with others similarly equipped it is entirely wanting. It is the power and the instrument of system and of method. The man who wields this weapon must be a man of purpose, of reserve, and of equilibrium. Senator Gorman possessed all these attributes. It requires a thorough insight into human nature. It is the peculiar skill of accomplishing those things that are demanded by circumstances and the tact to make the best use of opportunities and occasions as they present themselves. It demands a fixed purpose and a steady nerve and a resourceful mind and then, above all these things, comes the ability to instill into your subordinates the inspiration of your example and to infuse into the masses to whom you look for results the zeal and enthusiasm that are the accompaniments of success.

Of course a man who has occupied, like Senator Gorman, a position of this sort is bound to create hostility. Like everyone else similarly situated he had hosts of friends and hosts of enemies. There is one thing remarkable about his career, however, and that is he had few, if any, personal enemies. The elements that were inimical to him entertained no unfriendly feeling toward him personally.

As a rule every political leader is surrounded by a retinue of friends who follow him in order to participate with him in his victories and often desert and betray him when disaster overtakes him. Senator Gorman's situation was peculiar in this respect. He had made friends who were as loyal to him when his fortunes wavered as they were in the hour of his greatest triumph. At one of the largest political meetings held in our State during the last Congressional canvass the mention of his name elicited as much applause from the ranks of the party as if his living figure had stood before the assemblage. He always believed in the precept, "The friends thou hast and their adoption tried, grapple them to thy soul with hooks of steel."

His force was that of attraction and not of repulsion. Without being demonstrative, his bearing was at all times genial, his carriage and intercourse with his fellow-men were without the slightest pomp or pageantry, and he was always accessible to the humblest one of his constituents. He never sat in state, and he gathered no delight whatever from display or ostentation. He had too much wisdom for pride or vanity or exaltation. Vanity is generally the attribute of weak minds and of persons who glide along the surface—those who are thoughtful and profound are as a rule humble and lowly. Some one said of Francis Bacon that he was fraught with all the learning of the past and almost prescient of the future, but too wise not to know his weakness and too philosophic not to feel his ignorance.

Mr. GORMAN was devoted to his work in the Senate. dedicated to it the best years and energies of his life and had thoroughly understood and mastered it. Senators who served with him upon committees here will bear testimony to his faithful attention to the duties that devolved upon him, his untiring industry, his assiduous consideration of every practical problem that was submitted to him, his capacity for constructive legislation, the analytical methods that he pursued in his work, and the experience that he brought to play in dealing with important questions of governmental expenditures, and his faculty of summarizing propositions upon this floor in a manner that made them easily comprehended.

When we think of it, his career was a remarkable one. He had risen from an humble position in this body to the highest and most commanding station. It was not the extraneous influ-ence of good fortune that had visited upon him the successive preferments that he received, nor did he claim the advantage of a great ancestral line from whom he might have derived the heritage of honor and fame. He advanced from place to place, first in the general assembly, then to the leadership of the party organization in his State, then to the Senate here, and his leadership of his party, and then to the command of his party forces in the country, simply because he possessed the power and the qualifications that entitled him to these distinctions. places were not gifts to him, nor awarded to him because of any seniority of service in the ranks of his party, nor in accordance with any rule, custom, or usage, but because it was discerned by those who knew him best and were fully capable of judging of his merits that he had the natural qualifications to successfully perform these important functions, and in his palmy days he never disappointed his followers and never fell below the expectations that were entertained of him.

If I were asked to select the most important service that our lamented friend rendered to his party beyond these halls, would refer to the part he took in the election of Mr. Cleveland for President. His tireless and incessant work upon this occasion will be long remembered—that is to say, it should be remembered. I do not believe that at a time of this sort it is proper to indulge in undue adulation of those whose memory we are honoring or to bestow exaggerated praise above what merit calls for, and I am sure that Senator Gorman, if he were living, would not appreciate any laudatory statements of any services that he had ever performed, either for his party or his country, that he was not fully entitled to. I will, therefore, not say that his efforts elected Mr. Cleveland to the Presidency, but I will, without hesitation, say that he did more than any other single individual toward the consummation of that victory. He was an untiring worker when he applied himself to the accomplishment of any purpose that he had in view—covering every detail of the programme before him and not overlooking the slightest minutiæ that could be of any advantage to him whatever.

In this contest he had before him a political geography of the United States, with all of its territory and environment. He studied every State, city, and district where there was a hope of He kept in constant view every stronghold Democratic success. of his own party and every weak and unprotected point in the fortifications of the enemy. He permitted no spot to escape him where it was possible to make an inroad upon the possessions of He brought himself into personal contact with all the party leaders all over the land. He dismissed from his consideration every place where success was impossible and effected a thorough organization in all places where there was a hope of It was an enormous work of immense proportions, and the result demonstrated that in its prosecution and its trium-phant termination he simply outgeneraled the chieftains of the Republican party, and working at a disadvantage against them overcame them by the craft and skill of his political leadership. Of course, the Democratic hosts were with him, and the inde-pendent vote of the country was really the balance of power that decided the contest, but beyond it all was a thorough and perfect organization, disciplined and marshaled by Senator Gorman

If I were asked to name the most valuable service that he rendered to his party-and I believe to the country-in the Senate, I would immediately select his memorable work in connection with the defeat of the measure known as the force bill in the Fifty-first Congress. I think the Republican Senators upon this floor have long ago arrived at the conclusion that the passage of this bill would have been detrimental to the best interests of the people. Whatever differences of opinion existed at the time in connection therewith when party spirit ran high, it is my judgment now that the result of this great struggle has been accepted as final by the intelligence and patriotism of the Republican party. At the time, however, it was as fierce a conflict as ever engaged the attention of the country, and with the fate of the enactment trembling in the balance during many months there was a period of great excitement, and party sentiment was aroused to an intense degree, and into this conflict Senator Gorman threw himself with an earnestness of purpose that can never be forgotten.

He was the leader of his party in that contest, and if it had not been for his devotion to the cause he was championing, for his parliamentary skill in the resourceful attacks which he made when defeat seemed certain, and for the restless labor he underwent throughout the wearisome days of that momentous period, we might to-day, instead of having the South united in the interest of the Union and pervaded by a spirit of patriotism as earnest and as ardent as any that throbs in the heart of any other section of this country, have every one of her Common-wealths submerged in ruin and disaster, with their spirits broken, their enterprise retarded, and their entire territory, with the glorious progress that awaits it, converted into a desolated and subjugated political province.

I desire to refer now to one of the qualities of his private life which deserves mention. I have been informed by friends of Senator Gorman, who were upon terms of the closest intimacy with him, that while he did not indulge in any ostentatious acts of philanthropy that he was constantly engaged in acts of private benevolence and charity, and that any appeal of poverty or of suffering always awakened his tenderest sympathy and his ready response. This is the heart and essence of true re-ligion. When the time arrives for us to take a final reckoning with our life and balance the account, deeds like this are of more priceless value than all the accomplishments of ambition and all the achievements of fortune and fame, and all the possessions of power and of worldly glory and renown.

For modes of faith let graceless zealots fight, His can't be wrong whose life is in the right.

I come now briefly to another phase of Senator Gorman's life which I shall pass over tenderly, because I think it is too sacred for intrusion, even upon an occasion of this sort. The best impulses of his heart seemed to radiate around the glare of his fireside and the circle of his family. His happiest and most contented hours were passed among those to whom he was bound by the bonds of affection and for whose comfort and wellbeing he was at all times prepared to make any sacrifice invoked by love or duty. He found but slight amusement and took only a passing interest in the pleasures of the world, and he centered his deepest devotion upon the altar of his home, and his fondest hopes clustered around those who looked to him for aid and for counsel as they grew to manhood and womanhood under his fostering care.

I believe that if Senator Gorman at any time would have been required to have taken his choice between the accomplishment of his own ambition and his duty to those dependent upon him he would not have hesitated a moment in making the election. As full of ambition as he was, he would have abandoned the worship of its idols for the idols of his household. Our home is really the holiest spot on earth. It is the oasis in the trackless desert and the fountain amidst the parched and thirsty longings for restless power and aspirations unattained. As years go by the fleeting phantoms of political honor recede from view and we gladly retrace our steps to the temple we have rearedour own architecture—so that we may strengthen its pillars and rear its spires toward the sky.

There is no word or phrase in any language, dead or living, that I know of that carries with it the full significance of the English word "home." It is not capable of translation, or even of definition or interpretation, and I hope, therefore, that the day will never come when any iconoclast will change the orthography of that Anglo-Saxon term and destroy the memories and imagery that cluster around its meaning.

And now his pilgrimage is ended and he is in his eternal home, where the mystery is unfolded—a mystery that neither philosophy nor science has ever solved. We have unbosomed the secrets of the earth and exposed the cycles of geologic time and gazed into revolving planets, but we stand aghast and dumb at the problem of man's creation. We can explain from a natural standpoint almost everything except the most vital of them all, and that is the problem of our existence. Upon this subject we can gather as much information from the unlettered savage as we can from the profoundest thought that ever dawned upon the earth. The most learned scientist of the present age has written a volume entitled "The Riddle of the Universe," in which he has essayed modestly to solve the riddle, and the last page of this remarkable production leaves us absolutely forlorn, comfortless, and deserted, the human heart without an aspiration, and the universe an utter scene of desolation.

The German philosopher, Goethe, the profoundest student of his age, when one of his companions was communicating to him his doubts upon the authenticity of revealed religion, said, "My friend, give me some faith—I have sufficient doubts of my own without requiring them to be supplemented." The cynic, Rabelais, exclaimed, "Ring down the curtain; the farce is done." Spinoza, the outlaw of the synagogue and the greatest of them all, stood like a solitary sentinel upon the confines of the universe in communion with his Creator and constructed a system which has made him the idol of the philosophical world.

Mr. President, I have pored for years over this cheerless desire of human thought, and while I am a firm believer in the absolute liberty of thought, I can say what has been well said upon another occasion that my warm love of genuine liberty has never chilled me into rebellion with its author, and so I believe it was with our departed friend.

That is the impression he left on me upon the last occasion when I met him. I questioned him then in regard to his health, and while I had the gloomiest forebodings of the mortal malady that seemed to encompass him within its grasp, I was extremely careful not to communicate my thoughts, or to give him the slightest evidence of my feelings in that regard. He was a man of courage, and when he informed me that his physician had admonished him that his heart was seriously and perhaps fatally involved, one of the most beautiful of all poetic thoughts came speedily to my mind, because it was so appropriate to the occasion, that:

Our hearts though stout and brave, Still like muffled drums are beating Funeral marches to the grave.

I am told that he met death as he had passed through many critical vicissitudes of his active and remarkable career, with composure, with resignation, with fortitude, and with hope. The chamber of death always presents a scene of sorrow and often of despair, but penetrating the gloom there is a conviction more potent than all the processes of reasoning, that this can not be a finality in Creation's work, and that the soul can not perish when the chords and keys that gave it utterance are broken. Reason as we will, this belief, as the years go by, becomes a sacred and a divine inspiration, an inspiration that grows stronger and stronger as the frail tenement that contains it weakens and dissolves until, at the very moment of dissolution, in every life consecrated to some sublime and lofty purpose, it blazes forth and penetrates into distant realms with all the radiance of the morning sun.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, Mr. Gorman was a member of the Senate for twenty-one years, and for a greater portion of this time he was the acknowledged and responsible leader of his party in this Chamber. Nature made him a leader of men. This was shown not only by the character of his influence and services here, but by his absolute domination for a generation of the acts and policies of his party in Maryland and by the conspicuous position which he long held in national Democratic His successful management of the campaign of 1884. which resulted in the election of a Democratic President for the first time in twenty-eight years, gave him his first prominence as a commanding figure in national politics. In each successive campaign thereafter he was the trusted adviser alike of candidates and committees. He was three times prominently mentioned as a possible nominee for the Presidency, and many of his friends believe that if it had not been for the disadvantage of locality he would have received his party's indorsement for this high honor.

This record of successful political leadership in many fields has hardly a parallel in the history of the country. Mr. Gorman's supremacy in this respect never surprised those who knew him best—those who had the most thorough understanding and appreciation of his qualities of mind and heart. He was wise, skillful, and resourceful, and his genial presence and magnetic personality at once inspired confidence and secured allegiance.

In the notable contests which have taken place on this floor over great questions of public policy, when party advantage was earnestly sought by the contestants, Mr. Gorman appeared at his best. Cool and collected, he seemed always to know instinctively and at once the strength and weakness of his own position and that of his antagonists. In debate on such occasions he did not seek for rhetorical effect, but contented himself with stating his propositions clearly and concisely and in a manner which was admirable in tone and convincing in effect.

The value and importance to the country, however, of Mr. Gorman's services here were as a practical legislator and not as a political leader. In legislation he did not confine his attention to subjects reported from the Committee on Appropriations, of which he was long a leading member, but he took a prominent part in the consideration and disposition of every important subject that came before the Senate during his term of service. He brought to the discussion of these questions a sound judgment and clear perception. In all really great questions, involving the dignity or the welfare of the country, he put patriotism above partisanship. In the everyday work of the Senate, when no great party interest was at stake, his differences with his associates were never along party lines. At such times his intelligent insight into and broad treatment of public questions commanded the approval alike of his Republican and Democratic colleagues.

No man ever had a seat in this Chamber who more jealously guarded the rights and prerogatives of the Senate or who had a higher admiration for its history and traditions than the late Senator from Maryland. Coming here as a page in 1852, very much the larger portion of his mature life was spent within these walls. He knew personally most of the great men who have been active in public life for half a century. Under such circumstances it is not strange that Senator GORMAN's affection for the Senate should have been unusually deep and constant.

The rules and practices affecting debate and controlling the disposition of business in the Senate are unique in their character and are largely observed and enforced by unanimous consent. In trying times these conditions require frequent conferences between those who hold responsible positions with reference to the work of the Senate on both sides of the Chamber. These consultations necessarily afford unusual opportunities for the study of personal characteristics. I believe that all of my Republican associates who have taken an active part in conferences in which Senator Gorman appeared as the most important representative of his party will agree with me in placing a very high estimate upon the Senator's character as a man and as a legislator. His courtesy was unfailing, his knowledge of precedent unsurpassed, his agreements once made were kept with scrupulous fidelity, both in letter and in spirit. His wisdom, his moderation, his powers of persuasion have been invaluable in many a threatening emergency in the Senate.

My personal relations with Mr. Gorman during all the years of our common service were of the most friendly character, although we rarely found ourselves in agreement upon questions which were purely political in their nature. His personality was very attractive to me, and I believe he was incapable of doing a mean or a dishonorable act. He was fearless in the advocacy of measures that met his approval, and in common with men with positive convictions and the courage to act upon them at times he was subjected to severe criticism on the part of those who failed to agree with him.

There was nothing of the timeserver or the demagogue in his nature. He served his country with ability and fidelity, and is fully entitled to be held in grateful memory by his fellow countrymen.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, in the death of Senator Gorman one of the most remarkable men of our country has passed away. He had an extraordinary career, a career that challenged the admiration of the entire country. No public man was more universally beloved in the South than Senator Gorman. He had been the steadfast friend of the people of the South in the hour of the darkest trial, and we trusted and loved him. Universal sorrow prevailed among our people when his death was announced. We knew we had lost a valuable and faithful friend. Mr. Gorman took his seat in the Senate March 4, 1881, and served continuously for eighteen years. His party was defeated in Maryland in 1898, and he retired from the Senate March 3, 1899. He only remained in private life a short while. Two years later his party triumphed in Maryland, and he returned to the Senate for a fourth term, receiving practically the unanimous vote of his party. He received the congratulations of friends on both sides of the Chamber, for his colleagues, regardless of party, recognized the valuable services he had rendered his country.

I only had a casual acquaintance with Senator Gorman before I became a member of the Senate. I was introduced to him by Mr. Crisp, who regarded Mr. Gorman as one of the ablest men in public life. Mr. Crisp said to me that Senator GORMAN was a loyal friend, a wise counselor, and a safe leader. At that time the thought never occurred to me that I would some day be his colleague in this body.

Association with Mr. Gorman demonstrated to me that Mr. Crisp had formed a correct judgment as to the worth of this great man. He was one of the noted men of the Senate.

He began as a page on the floor of the Senate.

He began as a page on the floor of the Senate and by the force of his own energy and talents he became the acknowledged leader of his party. His career illustrates the possibilities of American citizenship.

The story of his life, the success he achieved, the good he accomplished, will for all time be an inspiration to the young men of the country

Almost for a quarter of a century his name was intimately associated with the legislative history of the country

On the floor of the Senate he was an attractive figure; he never spoke to empty benches; his speeches were short, pointed, forcible, and convincing. He never talked unless he had something to say. He mastered his subject before he entered the arena of debate.

I became a member of the Senate in March, 1897, and consequently served with Senator Gorman in the Senate only five years. During this time he frequently participated in the debates and was one of the most attractive speakers on the floor of the Senate.

The Congressional Record will show that during his entire Senatorial career he participated in the debates of the Senate on many subjects, including the tariff of 1883–1888 and 1890, 1893, and 1897; interstate commerce; Chinese immigration; the public printing; the Canadian fisheries; the building of the Navy; the Canadian and domestic transportation traffic; the Treasury surplus, and, in fact, nearly every question of importance that came before Congress.

When he spoke Senators from both sides of the Chamber would hasten to their seats, and he would invariably have a full and attentive audience with him, to stay until he had finished. No Senator spoke to larger audiences than did Senator

When we study his public life and appreciate the high order of his talents we can easily understand the influence he exerted over others. He was a man of convictions, sought diligently to form correct conclusions, and was thoroughly in earnest in debate. He convinced his hearers that he was right and easily carried them with him. He used no surplus words; he spoke briefly, but pointedly, and when he was through there was little to be said on his side of the subject.

The Democratic party has succeeded in only two national campaigns since the civil war. Grover Cleveland was elected President of the United States in 1884 and was the first Democratic President to take the reins of Government since Mr. Buchanan retired from the Presidential office.

So conspicuous and valuable was the part taken by Mr. Gor-MAN in the national campaign of 1884, it was but natural to expect that he would be a powerful factor in shaping the policy of the new Administration.

As chairman of the national executive committee, he was the guiding hand of that remarkable campaign. His party gave due credit to him and attributed the success achieved to his skillful and faultless management. Such public men as Manning, Bayand faultiess management. Such public men as Manning, Bay-ard, Garland, and Lamar recognized that Mr. Gorman's services in behalf of his party made him the proper person to lead the Administration forces on the floor of the Senate. In fact, the whole country knew that he was the guiding hand that had once more placed Democracy in power. Mr. Gorman was the recipient of ovations wherever he went at the close of that campaign.

It is but just to say at this time that Mr. Cleveland appreciated the valuable services the Maryland Senator had rendered in securing his triumphant election, and he enjoyed the confidence and friendship of Mr. Cleveland during his first term in

He was a conspicuous factor in the campaign when Mr. Cleveland was elected the second time. In Mr. Cleveland's last Administration the public soon learned that Mr. Gorman's influence had greatly suffered with the President. Due regard for the truth compels me to say that we have unmistakable evidence that the President would not listen to the advice and counsel of Mr. Gorman during his last Administration. When the truth of history is written the embarrassments and subsequent overthrow of the Democratic party will be largely attributed to the want of party harmony

Mr. Gorman was entitled to the respect and confidence of the President; he had always been loyal, and had rendered conspicuous service to his party, and his counsel and advice were constantly needed to bring together and harmonize the different elements of the Democratic party to the support of the Administration. At that time there were many antagonistic elements in the party, and Mr. Gorman possessed the happy faculty of ad-justing differences and felt anxiety about the future harmony of his party. His counsel and advice, however, did not prevail, and disastrous results followed.

I have always believed that if the wise and conservative policy advocated by Mr. Gorman had prevailed the different elements in the Democratic party could have been kept together and the party would have been greatly strengthened for future usefulness

Mr. Gorman recognized that two great political parties, each contesting for supremacy, were necessary for the preservation of our institutions. Two great political parties, evenly balanced, debating great issues, scrutinizing closely the conduct of each other, insures to the people clean, honest, good government. The position of chairman of the minority conference in the Senate is one of honor and responsibility. The chairman pre-sides over the minority conference and is a recognized leader of the minority.

Mr. Gorman was unanimously chosen for this position in I hold in my hand a clipping from a reputable newspaper, giving an account of his election and valuable services as a leader of the minority, including a statement of the brilliant and successful fight he made against the force bill, which I insert as part of my remarks.

I have been assured by his associates in this Chamber still living of the correctness of this statement of his connection with this parliamentary struggle.

I do not insert it to revive the unpleasant memories growing out of that contest, but to show the estimate placed upon the services of the distinguished dead in defeating this legislation. The article is as follows:

The article is as follows:

Upon the death of Mr. Beck, of Kentucky, in 1889, Mr. Gorman was promptly and unanimously chosen for the position by his Democratic colleagues.

The accession of Mr. Gorman to the post of active minority leadership was the more gladly halled by Democratic Senators for the reason that, at the very time of his election, the odious "force bill," which was a source of so much anxiety and fearful apprehension on the part of the southern Democrats, had passed the House under Speaker Reed's dictatorship and was hanging like a cloud over the deliberations of the Senate, in which the Republicans had a clear majority of eleven votes. In this great emergency the Democratic minority placed especial reliance upon their resourceful leader, whose mettle had already been tried and whose skill as a parliamentarian was recognized on both sides of the Chamber.

DEFEAT OF THE FORCE BILL.

DEFEAT OF THE FORCE BILL.

been tried and whose skill as a parliamentarian was recognized on both sides of the Chamber.

The Republicans introduced two distinctive party measures into the Fifty-first Congress—the McKinley tariff bill and the Lodge election law, commonly known as the "force bill." Both had, at the start, the solid support of their party organization, and both were put through the House under the "Reed rules," at the first session, without the formality of debate or deliberate consideration. The McKinley bill also passed the Senate near the end of the first session, on September 10, 1890, after a protracted debate, in which Mr. Gorman took an active and strongly antagonistic position. It passed by a strict party vote, having eleven majority. Its companion measure, the force bill, was allowed to go over to the second session, because the Democrats threatened to fight it to the bitter end, and the Republicans were compelled to take a recess for the fall campaign.

When the second session came together, in December, 1890, the Republicans of the Senate received a renewed partisan impulse to stand together and drive it through as a party measure from two sources; first, from the unfavorable trend shown by the fall elections, and, second, by a vigorous advocacy of its early passage in the message of President Harrison. Accordingly the measure was taken up on the first day of the session, all other things being put aside, and pressed with all the energy and parliamentary skill known to the skillful parliamentarians of the majority of the Senate. The McKinley bill had received eleven majority a few months earlier, and the advocates of the Senate, was in charge of the most accomplished parliamentarians of the Senate, was in charge of the bill, and he had for his active aids and constant coadjutors Mr. Aldrich, Mr. Edmunds, and all the most skillful lawyers and managers of the majority. Against this compact, aggressive, and determined force stood the solid Democratic strength of the Senate, and of the general principles of parliamen their strong, vigilant, and well-balanced leader, or, as Senator Bayard had expressed it, "the quiet, self-sustaining and self-sustained man whom Maryland has given to the Union." Mr. Gorman was the equal in parliamentary and tactical skill of any man on the Republican side, and, as the result showed, the superior of them all.

The greatest inspiration of the minority during the seven long weeks of the bitter and exhausting struggle was the serene and perfect confidence of their leader, who never for a moment entertained the idea of defeat. This splendid spirit of confident aggressiveness was marked upon by all, and communicating itself to the whole minority added much to their esprit de corps. It also seemed to perplex and confound the majority and had its effect upon the observant country. Democratic Senators, interpreting the force bill as a measure designed for the reinstalement and perpetuation of negro domination in the South, put their whole souls into the contest, and realizing the necessity of perfect discipline to accomplish their ends, conceded much to the discretion and judgment of their appointed leader.

Rarely has a parliamentary leader been invested with such complete command as was Senator Gorman during the memorable battle. Old employees of the Senate relate incidents of the leading and distinguished Southern Senators applying to the chairman of the minority conference to know if it was advisable for them to go down to the restaurant on the floor below for lunch, and reporting whenever they temporarily withdrew from the Chamber where they might be found in an emergency.

The first test of strength came on the first day of the session.

conference to know it it was advisable for them to go down to the restaurant on the floor below for lunch, and reporting whenever they temporarily withdrew from the Chamber where they might be found in an emergency.

The first test of strength came on the first day of the session, December 3, 1890, on Mr. Hoar's motion to take up the bill for consideration, which was adopted by a vote of 41 to 30, showing the Republican party strength. Had the final vote been taken on that day the bill would undoubtedly have been passed by the same majority. The final test came on January 26, 1891, when Mr. Wolcott, of Colorado, asked Mr. Morgan to yield the floor in order that he might move to take up the bill making an apportionment of representation in Congress under the Eleventh Census, which motion was adopted by a vote of 35 to 34, thus displacing and finally disposing of the force bill. During the intervening seven weeks the Democratic minority had held the floor constantly throughout the day and often through the night, when night sessions were forced. Every alternative known to parliamentary skill looking to the forcing of a vote on the bill was tried from time to time by the Republicans, but they were met at every turn and always baffled. Wearying of the effort to terminate the debate, the majority tried, as a last resort, to take a Senator off the floor for the purpose of adopting a cloture resolution, but the Vice-President failed them at the last moment of this revolutionary proceeding, weakening in his purpose before the well-directed fire of the minority. During the seven weeks of untiring vigilance Mr. Gomman occupied the floor a considerable portion of the time himself and contributed much to the parliamentary feature of the debate. In the meantime the eyes of the country had been opened to the unfair and partisan character of the pending measure. The public sentiment of the country admired the splendid fight the Democrats had made against it and sympathized with the South against the proposed sectional discrim

I doubt if any public man has rendered more valuable services to his party and country than Senator Gorman during the last quarter of a century. By reason of his conspicuous service, his eminent ability, and sterling integrity he was entitled to his party nomination for the office of the President of the United He had a strong following in many sections of the country for this high honor, but history teaches us that party service and party loyalty is not always appreciated and properly rewarded.

Neither Webster, Clay, Calhoun, Benton, nor Blaine ever reached the Presidency, but each has left an enduring fame not cellipsed by any occupant of the Presidential chair.

Mr. Gorman would have made an admirable President. career is closed, but was one of the most remarkable in the history of our country. The young men of the Republic can be taught to study his history, follow his counsel, and the world is The young men of the Republic can be better by reason of his public life. When we read the story of his life we are not surprised at the success he achieved. He was a self-made man; he began life without money. He came from a modest home, where love of neighbors and love of country was inculcated and where self-reliance was taught. In early life he knew the value of industry. He acted on the maxim that nothing was impossible to industry. He was kind, generous, unselfish, with a heart full of sympathy for humanity.

To my certain knowledge he helped the weak and lowly in their efforts to be strong. The good he accomplished will for all time be an inspiration for the young men of the country. They will read his history and follow in the footpaths blazed out by this illustrious son of the Republic.

The influence of the good never dies. I am sure that this generation and all generations to come will be better, stronger, wiser, and happier by reason of his life.

We teach our sons to study the character of the great Roman senators, to practice their virtues, and we are the recipients of untold blessings from those who have been dead more than a thousand years.

I wish to give to his memory only just praise, for I am sure if he could have a voice as to the character of these exercises he would not countenance false praise.

While not a college graduate, he was a student, a hard worker, and kept thoroughly posted on the current business of the Senate. His conceptions were quick and remarkably accurate; his judgment was good of both men and measures. been found with such a rare combination of faculties and powers as he possessed. Though frequently most bitterly assailed, his entire public career was pure, honest, fearless, and patriotic.

All great men at some period in their career have been mis-understood, slandered, and maligned.

Washington, Jefferson, Clay, Webster, Calhoun, Jackson, and Blaine were the subjects of most bitter attacks, but history has done each justice. Passion and prejudice die, and truth and justice triumph.

When the historian shall record the truth of Senator Gorman's life this story will be both interesting and instructive. truth be told and the story will show a life devoted to toil, devotion to duty, and honest and faithful in all the relations of This story will show that he was a man of convictions, and that he battled fearlessly and unrelentingly to accomplish his purposes; that he was not only a man of ability, but of integrity and high courage; that he was a man who loved the whole country and bore no malice in his heart toward anyone. This story, truthfully and impartially related, will show that he fought openly and manfully for what he believed to be right, and that he fought for those things which he firmly believed would advance the best interests of his country.

When I first knew him the relations between us were not so cordial; we did not know and understand each other. I knew of him the better I liked him. When he died we were warm, sincere, and devoted friends.

He was a Senator with long service and was helpful to me in the discharge of my duties. I express my sincere convictions when I say he was a pure, honest, and fearless patriot. I honored, respected, and loved Senator Gorman. In his death we have lost a most illustrious member, a wise and safe leader, an able statesman, and an accomplished gentleman.

Senator Gorman attained his high distinction in the service and counsels of his country by the practice of those cardinal virtues which constitute the road to elevation and fame.

History teaches us from the first settlement of Maryland she never authorized a single act of intolerance against any de-nomination of Christians. Maryland established the practice of Christian toleration in the new hemisphere and laid the great work for the complete superstructure, which was after-wards reared by the hands of Jefferson and his illustrious colaborers, of the cause of truth.

Mr. Bancroft tells us she was the first to give religious liberty a home, its only home in the wide world, where the disfranchised friends of prelacy from Massachusetts and the Puritans from Virginia were welcome to equal liberty of conscience and political rights:

The first of every land in all the world
Where love of God, in peace, each creed defined,
And freedom of the heart was certified
By freedom of the mind;

Where Christian each might worship as he willed, Where temples throning different faiths arose, Where bigot and where martyr, side by side, Were shielded from their foes.

It was lamentable to see men who had fled from the Old World to secure the enjoyment of civil and religious liberty themselves and their children persecuting their fellow-men for a difference in creed. Maryland taught a better lesson and exemplified her teachings by her practice.

The Republic has followed the splendid example taught in the early history of the nation by the sons of Maryland.

Senator Gorman began life with correct principles. He firmly exemplified by every act of his life his belief and adherence to the principles taught by the founders of his State.

The spirit of toleration characterized every act of his life. He believed that every citizen of the Republic was entitled to the peaceful enjoyment of civil and religious liberty.

Mr. President, a great man is gone. His life work is ended. In his private life he was kind, courteous, generous, and noble. He has fulfilled his mission and done his work well.

It can be truly said that he manfully discharged every private and public obligation of life.

His history shows us much to admire and to emulate. He has made a record of which we all may be proud. He has set an example that all of us who survive him may well follow.

In his death his State has lost one of her most illustrious sons and the country one of its ablest and purest statesmen.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the late Senator from Maryland and I came to the Senate at the same time, standing at the desk together where we were sworn in on the 4th day of March, 1881, the opening day of the Forty-seventh Congress. Mr. Gorman before that had no Congressional service, but was prominent in his party and was accounted as its leader in the State of Maryland. He had acquired legislative experience by service in both branches of the Maryland legislature; was prominent in large business enterprises in the State, and so, both by natural ability and by experience, was amply qualified to render important service in this body.

It was my good fortune to be placed with him on important committees and to become closely acquainted with him in a personal intercourse which developed a friendship upon which I have always set great value and to which I contributed a sincere regard, founded upon the deepest respect. I do not recall a single instance where this friendship, though Mr. Gorman and I had many sharp conflicts upon this floor, was ever strained or interrupted.

The fine character and great services of the late Senator have been so well portrayed by the eloquent Senator from Maryland who presents the resolutions, and by other Senators who had long service with him, that in what I am to say briefly I shall confine myself to the consideration of Mr. Gorman's service in the Senate as a great legislator.

He could make speeches, always good and never long. He could maintain the organization of his party on this floor, where he was its acknowledged leader. His eye was quick in discerning any weakness in the action of his opponents when purely political measures were up for discussion and action. He was wary and a master of expedient and device, and was sleepless in exercising the mastery that was acceded to him in the councils of his party, both here and elsewhere.

But beyond these things, Mr. President—and I should say greater than all these things in estimating Mr. Gorman's public service—was his prominence as a great legislator and in shaping general legislation. He gave the best part of his time to this field of duty. It is not so picturesque a field, Mr. President, as some others. Its product and its results do not so often occupy the newspapers or arouse immediate public interest, but the grave and thoughtful temperament of Mr. Gorman, his selfpoise, and his sedateness all suited with that work here which is formulated and worked out and at last crystallized into what I may call good legislation. Into this domain Mr. Gorman never intruded mere party politics. He acted with unwavering fidelity with either Democrat or Republican who sought to put upon the statute book subjects of legislation for the benefit of all the people.

Neither upon this floor nor in committee room in this work did Mr. Gorman subordinate the public interest to party preference or advantage. He not only contributed to the work of a good legislator by his quiet, effective work in committee, but in hundreds of instances on this floor he was able to show, by his great facility as a debater, how important he counted the public good and how earnest was his desire to contribute to it.

It will be a long day, Mr. President, before the superior of the late Senator from Maryland, in this regard, will be found upon this floor upon either side of the Chamber.

Mr. President, the service here of an old Senator, although in the highest degree honorable and sought by us all, is not easy nor always comfortable and, perhaps I may say, not always enjoyable. It is beset with added labor and responsibility and the necessity, at times, for independence of thought and action, and a fearlessness, which may not always be upon the right side and certainly is not infrequently upon the unpopular side. And, added to all this, is the saddening feature, in an older Senator's career, of seeing his friends and associates drop away in the march of time until at last he stands comparatively alone

When a Senator like Mr. Gorman is called from duty in this body, by a summons which no man can resist, he is missed and mourned by all, but by none so keenly as the men with whom he has been longest associated.

There are to-day, Mr. President, but two Senators on this floor who had seats here when Mr. Gorman and I entered the Senate and who have held continuous service ever since—the distinguished Senator from Iowa, Mr. Allison, and the distinguished Senator from Alabama, Mr. Morgan. Senator Teller's service was interrupted by his Cabinet service in President Arthur's Administration. All the rest have fallen out by the way. They make their loss felt not by any proclamation or outward show, but in that intangible way that sinks the deepest into the human heart. We realize the missed footstep, the clear voice on this floor silent, the calm face at the committee table absent, and all this we feel and we know in the death of the late Senator from Maryland.

We miss all his great qualities. We shall miss his active participation in debate, his guiding hand in legislation, and his prominence in the battles fought on this floor. Let us hope and believe that from these he has passed "to where, beyond these volces, there is peace."

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, the remarks that I shall make will be very brief, but I did not feel that I could afford to miss the opportunity of saying a few words upon this occasion.

We have to-day laid aside the ordinary business of the Senate that we may pay our tribute to the memory of a loved and respected colleague, ARTHUR PUE GORMAN, late a Senator from Maryland, who for many years was one of the most prominent members of this body.

Senator Gorman had a remarkable public career. Without the advantages of a great family name, without wealth, with a limited education, through his own exertions alone, he rose from an humble employee of this Senate to the position of one of its members and a leader of his party second to none in my term of service.

He was educated in that greatest of all schools, the school of experience. And in his case what a school it was. He was in the service of the Senate during the most important and vital epoch in our history. In his early life he was familiar with those intellectual giants who were Senators during the stirring period preceding the civil war, during the civil war, followed by the days of reconstruction, when our destiny hung in the balance and when the nation, after a baptism of blood and fire, was made anew. Douglas, Seward, Hamlin, Jefferson Davis, Benjamin, Toombs, Houston, Cass, Wade, Sumner, Trumbull, Fessenden, Grimes, and many other of the most noted men in all our history were here as Senators during his early life.

all our history were here as Senators during his early life.

He was a protégé, friend, and follower of that illustrious Illinoisan, Stephen A. Douglas, than whom there was no abler statesman and Senator of his day.

Senator Gorman might be said to have been born a Douglas Democrat. His father was one of Douglas's greatest admirers, and followed his leader, like so many thousands of patriotic Douglas Democrats, in remaining true to the Union.

As a State legislator, as a leader of his party in Maryland, Senator Gorman early exhibited those qualities which later gave him so much prominence here. He was little known outside of his State until his election to the Senate in 1880, and the attention of the country was not much attracted to him until four years later, when he conducted the national Democratic campaign of that year, and when, for the first time in twenty-eight years, the national Democratic party was successful and Grover Cleveland was elected President.

As national chairman he showed himself to be a splendid political organizer. In his conduct of the campaign no mistakes were made, and he was entitled to much of the credit for the election of a comparatively unknown local politician of New York against one of the most brilliant and popular statesmen since the days of Henry Clay—James G. Blaine.

of Henry Clay—James G. Blaine.

I have always felt that Mr. Blaine owed his defeat to two causes—first, the far superior organization and conduct of Mr. Cleveland's campaign under direction of Mr. Gorman; and, second, to the mistakes and mismanagement of Mr. Blaine's campaign.

Senator Gorman soon succeeded to the leadership of his party in the Senate. There were others older in years and service, but the leadership seemed to naturally fall to him. He was the real leader in fact as well as in name, and continued as such so long as he remained in the Senate.

He was not a specially brilliant speaker, but he was a clear and forceful talker and an able and dangerous antagonist in debate.

His charming personality, his suavity of manner, his magnetic influence over men with whom he came in contact, combined with his marked ability, made it easy for him to retain the difficult position of a leader of one of the great parties in this body. Some one said of him that his smile was as winsome as ever wooed a vote out of a man's conscience. He enjoyed in the highest degree the respect and confidence of every Senator with whom he served on both sides of the Chamber.

Many Senators here very well remember the long and successful fight, echoed and reechoed in every journal of the United States, which Mr. Gorman led, and which resulted in the defeat of the bill known as the "force bill." As much as Senators on this side regretted the defeat of that bill, we were all forced to admire Mr. Gorman's generalship in defeating it.

I had the pleasure of knowing Senator Gorman intimately for more than twenty years, and what I say of him I say from my own personal acquaintance and observation. He was a member of this body when I entered it in 1883. He was among the first to take a deep interest in the regulation of interstate commerce, and from the first to the last he favored the rigid regulation of railroads.

The late Senators Platt of Connecticut and Harris of Tennessee, ex-Senator Miller of New York, Senator Gorman, and myself constituted the Select Committee on Interstate Commerce which made a thorough investigation of the subject in 1886. Senator Gorman took a prominent part in the investigation and in the preparation of the original interstate-commerce act, passed in 1887. We traveled over various parts of the country, and held hearings in our larger cities.

I will be pardoned for relating a little incident that took place when the committee was in New York, on a Sunday. It so happened that there were three ex-Presidents of the United States in New York at that time—ex-Presidents Grant, Hayes, and Arthur—and we determined to call upon them before leaving the city. We called on President Grant first. It seemed strange that Senator Gorman had never actually met General Grant until then. I had the pleasure of introducing them, and I remember very well that General Grant seemed very much pleased to meet Senator Gorman, who had become a national figure, and manifested great interest in him.

The greatest general of the age was then in a practically dying condition, although he was seated in a chair, surrounded by his books and papers, trying to finish his famous book in order to leave something to support his wife and family. The General knew that he could live but a short time, and, quite characteristically of him, he seemed to take it calmly and philosophically. He said that his book was finished; that if he could live a little longer—until September, I think he said—he could perfect and improve it, but that he was ready to go at any time. He passed away in a little more than three weeks after we saw him.

For a number of years Senator Gorman was a member of the Committee on Appropriations. Senators on that committee who served with him will agree that a more valuable and useful member that committee has never had. He was master of all the countless details of the expenditures of the Government.

Senator Gorman was a business man, and was thoroughly familiar with the tariff. Senators well remember the prominent part which he took in the discussion and passage of the bill known as the "Wilson-Gorman bill." It left the Senate with nearly 700 amendments. He was not a believer in free trade, but he did believe in a low tariff. The tariff is a question that not only divides the two great parties, but has often caused divisions within both parties. There have been endless discussions over the Wilson tariff act. Personally I have always believed that it was due to Senator Gorman that a much more injurious act to the industries of the country was not enacted.

Mr. Gorman's two leading characteristics were, first, his marked ability as a leader; and second, his conservatism as a statesman and legislator. I desire, Mr. President, to enforce those two prominent facts in his character. First, he was a born leader; and second, he was a conservative legislator and statesman. He was a Democrat, but was a conservative one. He did not believe in radical measures. When a great partisan question, such as the force bill, was before the Senate he stood loyally with his party, but he did not believe in dragging partisanship into questions generally coming before Congress. He looked at public questions from the standpoint of a careful, conservative business man, and was generally against any measures that in his judgment would disturb the business of the country or endanger the stability of the Government. He was essentially a safe and able legislator.

Senator Gorman was a Democrat under all circumstances and conditions. He remained true to his party and fought its battles, even though in later years it adopted principles with which he was not in sympathy. If he could not lead it, he followed it. He did not sympathize with the free-silver doctrine, but on that account he did not abandon the party, but went down with it in defeat. The free-silver platform cost him his seat in the Senate, as the Republicans on that issue gained ascendency in Maryland.

If this was the greatest defeat of his life, his greatest triumph was when five years later he carried the State and legislature and was unanimously and triumphantly returned to his seat in the Senate, where he was welcomed by his friends and colleagues of both parties, and in recognition of his superior qualifications was again made the minority leader.

Mr. Gorman has been sneered at by the reformers as being a politician. He was a politician, Mr. President. Had it not been for his ability as a politician he would not have been a member of this distinguished body. He was for years one of the leading politicians of his party. But he was something more. His conduct during his long service in the Senate demonstrated that he was a statesman of no mean order. Every statesman is of necessity a politician, but every politician is not a statesman. The immortal Lincoln was one of the shrewdest politicians of his day, and that was one of the elements of his strength. It added instead of detracting from his other great and noble qualities. It is no discredit to a man in public life to be called a politician, because every successful man in public life is a politician.

From the time that Mr. Gorman became prominent in national affairs until his death it was believed that he was ambitious to become President of the United States. At one time he could have been the nominee of his party. Ambitious he certainly was, but whether it was the possible fear of defeat, as claimed by his enemies, or a disinclination to assume the responsibilities of the great office of President that seemed to make him hesitate rather than actually seek it, I do not know. My acquaintance with and observation of him lead me to the conclusion that, unlike most of our prominent statesmen of to-day, he did not care sufficiently for the office to actually seek it.

If he had retained his health he would have retained all of

If he had retained his health he would have retained all of his old influence with his party, both in and out of the Senate, but in his life—he had lived years where others had lived months—his once vigorous constitution became undermined, and in the language of a British statesman, pronouncing a eulogy over Prince Albert, "came the blind fury with the abhorred shears and split the thin-spun life."

Senator Gorman passed away, as I believe he would have wished, one of the most honored and respected members of this body, in whose service the younger years of his life were spent.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. President, after listening to the tributes that have been paid to the dead Senator from Maryland—that which has been pronounced in his own matchless fashion by his eloquent colleague, the senior Senator from that State, and the others, exceptionally elaborate and finished and just—it would seem that there was little, if indeed anything, to be said. But I can not gain my own consent to allow this occasion to pass without bearing my poor tribute to the memory of the dead Senator. My acquaintance with him was too long, my association with him too close, my estimate of him was too high, and my affection for him too sincere for me to observe silence.

Sir, we may well pause at the grave and ponder on the life of a man who was big enough and strong enough to play the part of a conceded leader of his fellows and leave an imperishable impression upon the days and times in which he lived. It may be true, sir, and I doubt not as a rule it is true, that men are mainly in point of their career the product of two forces—heredity and environment. I doubt not it is true that select where you may as a general rule there is little left in a man's career save the product of one or both of these forces. But occasionally we meet with a man who is taken out of that general rule, who is possessed of an inherent sturdiness of character, of an ability, of a persistency, and of those intellectual and moral qualities that make him the exception to the rule.

Such a man was Senator Gorman. He was not the beneficiary either of heredity or of environment. He came from the body of the great common people, with no illustrious lineage behind him, with neither fortune nor fame nor surroundings that were conspicuously fortunate. He began at the bottom; he ended his life at the top, measured by any crucial standard that you may see fit to apply. His career was too long and it was too thoroughly crowded and studded with achievements of no ordinary character to permit of anything like a complete review on an occasion like this.

I would not seek, friend as I was to him, I would not ask, nay, sir, I would not have said of him to-day one single syllable of panegyric or undeserved eulogium. I would not measure out even to the dead, however close they may have been in life, aught except a fair, full measure of justice.

His colleague, in that splendid burst of eloquence with which he paid his tribute to the dead statesman, has told you that a man of positive character as was Mr. Gorman, naturally, inevitably gathered about him hosts of friends, but with equal necessity created numberless opponents. It is to-day one purpose, and only one purpose, that prompts me to speak, and that is to protest against the injustice to which he was subjected on one memorable occasion in his life where he was made the victim of unfair criticism, where, because of the conspicuous position that he held and the unquestioned power that he wielded, it was sought by others who deserved it more to fasten upon him responsibilities that ware not his own.

responsibilities that were not his own.

I refer to a memorable occasion in the political history of our country, fresh in the minds of many Senators who sit about me, when party representation in this Chamber was measured by so narrow a majority that a single vote was sufficient to tip the balance and determine the complexion of its legislation. When the tariff bill came from the House, the bill known as the "Wilson bill," which was to supersede the McKinley measure, Mr. GORMAN was indeed a potential factor in this Chamber. His action upon that occasion, his course in connection with that important measure have been made the occasion of unfair censure and unmerited criticism.

That bill, Mr. President, whilst it might have been, and by many was believed to be, a decided improvement upon the taxing measure that it supplanted, failed, as is known of all men, to meet the expectations of the country or the reasonable demands made by Mr. Gorman's party.

For that failure, and the failure is confessed and conceded, it was sought to fasten upon the Maryland Senator a decree of responsibility which did not honestly belong to him; and here, in order to vindicate the truth of history, I enter an earnest and solemn protest against that injustice surviving after he has gone. Other men of his party, then higher in station and in power than he was, who sought to relieve themselves of criticism by undertaking to fasten upon him a burden that did not belong to him, should answer at the bar of history instead of the dead Marylander.

The records of this Congress show, the Congressional Record, in its imperishable pages, will bear out the declaration, that when summoned to testify as witnesses upon this floor his colaborers upon the Senate Committee on Finance, most of them now dead, as is the Maryland Senator—Voorhees, of Indiana, the chairman of that committee, Harris, of Tennessee, Vest, of Missouri, and Jones, of Arkansas—bore willing witness to the fact that there never was a modification made in that measure, there never was a step taken in its revision or remodeling, there never was an alteration proposed or carried into effect by the conference of this side of the Chamber upon that tax bill which was not unhesitatingly approved and indorsed, pleaded for, and demanded by those higher in authority than Mr. Gorman or myself, who afterwards saw fit to denounce it and brand it with the brand of perfidy.

I protest here, in justice to the dead, that the responsibilities in that case did not belong to the man whose memory to-day we honor. He bore the unjust accusation patiently. That splendid serenity and poise which has been so happily described by his colleague did not desert him. That was one of the distinguishing characteristics of the man. He was always serene, always self-poised, and never taken by surprise. In the hour of his triumph and in the hour of his disasters and defeats he was always the same self-contained, the even-poised, undisturbed,

But if I were to single out one period in his service, one point in all his career, that to my mind was the most creditable and most to be admired, it would be his identification with that important period of our country's history to which allusion has been made by more than one of the Senators who have preceded me, to the part that GORMAN bore in the force-bill fight on the floor of the Senate.

In order to appreciate his conduct and his bearing and measure fairly the service that he rendered then, it is necessary for those who were not here at the time, as I was, to go back and acquaint themselves with the conditions that confronted us. The passions of the war had not entirely subsided. The bitterness of partisan feeling was running high indeed in these Chambers. The House of Representatives, without debate, had passed a bill which we of the South believed doomed that section to all the horrors of a revived carpetbag military government. We honestly believed that every hope and every aspiration that that great section of our country cherished was to be blighted, that the wheels of civilization were to be reversed, that we were to be turned back to a darker, aye, sir, to the darkest, period which ever marked the history of our country.

The House had passed the bill; the President had sent mes-

The House had passed the bill; the President had sent message after message urging the Senate to enact it; a clear majority of Senators upon this floor stood committed to its support whenever a final vote should be called for its passage. There was nothing left between the South and absolute chaos and utter wreck and ruin except what appeared to be the helpless and hopeless minority of Democrats upon this side of the Chamber. Passed through the House, indorsed by a majority of Senators upon the floor, who only waited for an opportunity to crystallize it into law, the President of the country telling us in special messages that he with itching hand was holding his pen ready to affix his approval and his signature—that was the dark outlook which we confronted.

Mr. GORMAN, to whom every Democrat turned as by instinct

Mr. Gorman, to whom every Democrat turned as by instinct as the leader, if one there be left on earth who could save his party and his country, stood at the head of that phalanx of undaunted, brave men interposing themselves for the protection of the South. Never while life lasts can I forget the incidents of that struggle. The days went by but slowly and the weeks dragged their weary length along, whilst without adjournment, night and day, that small band was on duty and its unswerving, brave, devoted commander was on deck.

I venture to assert that in all the tide of time you will search in vain among the records of the English-speaking peoples of this world to find a parallel to the splendid generalship, the resources, the matchless courage, the unquestioning devotion, and the brilliant commandership that Gorman manifested upon that occasion. A forlorn hope, of course, he led; battlements, impregnable, he could not scale, but he accomplished his purpose. He saved the South, and in my judgment he saved the North as well, when by a flank movement he side-tracked the force bill and buried it in a grave to which it should have been doomed upon its birth. The most splendid parliamentary battle of which history gives us record was the one that was fought and the one that was won by the Maryland leader.

Speaking in the light of a service in Congress not especially short, I frankly avow and without hesitation declare that I have never come in contact with a man in public life since first I entered the council chambers of my country who had in so great a degree all the properties and qualities that go to constitute a leader of men. I have never known either his superior or his equal.

I do not care to say more, Mr. President, but I deem it proper, in order that justice complete and full shall be done to him and his memory, to ask that I may insert in the Record of today's proceedings the resolution passed unanimously by the caucus of the Democratic party of the Senate on the occasion of his death.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, permission is granted.

The resolution referred to is as follows:

RESOLUTION UNANIMOUSLY ADOPTED BY THE DEMOCRATIC CAUCUS JUNE 9, 1906.

"The Democratic Senators at their first meeting in conference subsequent to the death of their former honored and loved chairman, the late Senator Gorman, obey their unaffected impulse in the expression of their profound sorrow for his loss to them as their personal friend and their sagacious, faithful political guide in their official relations.

"A faithful friend, zealous and wise party leader, considerate and conciliatory and careful of the interests of all, he greatly endeared himself to his party associates, by whom his memory will ever be most fondly cherished."

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, I shall pay my tribute to the memory of the late Senator Gorman in a very few words, but sincere.

During all the years we were associated together in this Chamber we were close personal friends. All the while we had a continuing pair, under the terms of which either was to vote whenever he pleased, each confident that the other would protect him whenever a political question was under consideration. It is not necessary for me to say that that confidence was never betrayed. I had for him a warm affection and ardent admiration, and I am proud to believe that the affection was reciprocated.

Prompted by that friendship I was interested in and observant of Mr. Gorman's remarkable public career. He was most bitterly assailed as an unscrupulous politician, ready at any time to avail himself of any means to secure the ends he sought. I have failed, sir, utterly to find any justification whatever for that charge. He was a politician—advoit, alert, full of resource. Possibly he was a partisan. If he was, I admire and do not censure. I have little faith in a man connected with a political party, who really and honestly believes in its principles, who is not ready at all times to defend and maintain them.

That Mr. Gorman would avail himself of every opportunity he honorably could to strengthen his party I have no doubt. I recall a somewhat spectacular illustration of that. I was present at the Republican ministerial meeting at the Fifth Avenue Hotel in New York when it was declared that the strength of the Democratic party was rum, Romanism, and rebellion. Mr. Gorman was chairman of the Democratic national committee. He saw that opportunity; he promptly availed himself of it, and in a few hours that wretched declaration was scattered broadcast all over this country. It was a most weighty contribution to the result. Mr. Blaine was defeated, Mr. Cleveland elected, and Senator Gorman did it.

Mr. President, when duty to his country seemed to Mr. Gorman to demand it, he disregarded party. When the civil war broke out he was a resident of the State of Maryland. In the face of party and of most powerful social influences, he was a loyal and devoted friend to the cause of the Union, utterly regardless of the effect it might have upon his fortunes in that State.

Mr. Gorman was the recognized leader on the Democratic side for many years. It was a position of great power. I never yet heard any Republican Senator charge him with an exercise of that power unfair or dishonorable.

Mr. Gorman was a thoroughly equipped business man. As such his services here were of great value. When in his judgment the best business interests of his country demanded he left party or disregarded party demands, as the records of this Chamber show.

His private life was without reproach. He had no vices, no bad habits. He was a man pure in thought and act. It was my good fortune to be an occasional visitor at his home in Maryland. It was an ideal home, with an ideal head. He was a tender, loyal, devoted husband, and an affectionate, indulgent father.

Mr. President, in Senator Gorman's death the Senate, his State, our country suffered a most serious loss, and that ideal home is desolate indeed.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, five times in the four short years in which I have been a member of this body we have been called upon to pay the last tribute to the memory of five of its most distinguished members. Six times in that short period the chilling hand of death has cast a dark shadow over this Chamber and the pale horse has entered its portal whence its mysterious rider has borne these great men away on the long journey to the mysterious beyond, a journey which the humble and the great, the rich and the poor, all alike, sooner or later must take. As they depart we are reminded that man's days upon earth are but "few and full of trouble" and that his glory is, like the flower of the field, soon to fade and wither.

While others who were long associated with him and who were more intimate with him have recounted his virtues, have reviewed the splendid career of Senator Gorman, whose departure we so grievously lament, I, as one of the younger Senators, arise simply to drop a tear, to add one flower to the chaplet, and to give expression of my sorrow at his sad taking off.

Mr. President, four years ago on the 4th of March next I

Mr. President, four years ago on the 4th of March next I entered this Chamber to take the oath of office and enter upon the discharge of my duties as a Senator of the United States. Mr. Gorman, having been an honored member for some eighteen years, had been retired. Four years later he was returning again in great triumph, again to take on the Senatorial toga, and to be the leader of his great party upon the floor. He was sworn in on that same day. This was the first time I had ever met and become personally acquainted with him, and I shall never forget the warm, cordial grasp of the hand and the gentle courtesy with which he welcomed me, the care with which he instructed me in the mysteries of the Senate, and his words of advice. He seemed to take a kindly interest in me at once and endeavored to make me feel that I was to be no stranger here.

endeavored to make me feel that I was to be no stranger here. I attended his funeral and followed his remains to their lasting resting place in the beautiful Oak Hill Cemetery, in this city. I was deeply impressed, as I think everyone present was, with the simplicity of the funeral. There was no lying in state, no cavalcade, no parade, no gathering of the great officers of the Government, no show; only the simple ceremony held in the parlor of his comfortable but unostentatious home in this city, his stately coffin surrounded by his bereaved and devoted family and a few of his most intimate friends. A short prayer was offered, a short yet beautiful and touching address by the minister, and it was all over. All of this was at his request, and shows this man's most charming characteristic, that of modesty, which marked him through life and which usually marks the great man.

Others have spoken of the great ability which so distinguished his public career. But looking back over these three years from 1903 to June, 1906, when he died, in this sad hour, as we pay loving tribute to his memory, I would recall not only his modest demeanor, but his kind and gentle spirit, his always ready and responsive sympathy, his freedom from bigotry, his evenness of temper, his forbearance, his charity, his uniform courtesy in conversation and in debate; these were some of the chief characteristics which made men love him, and these, with his great mind, made him not only a leader of the people, but a leader in every legislative body of which he was a member. Senator Gorman made his impress upon the whole country, and his death was lamented not only by the members of this body, but by the people throughout this broad land of ours. His seat here will not be easily filled. He was no ordinary man

His seat here will not be easily filled. He was no ordinary man.

He began his life work at the age of 13 as a page in this body, having been appointed by Stephen A. Douglas in 1852, in which position he served for twelve years, acting during that time as secretary to Mr. Douglas and as postmaster of the Senate. It was during these years that the fires of ambition were lighted and began to burn in his young heart. His associations with great men inspired him to be great also, and he often dreamed of the time when he should represent his State in this great body and take the place of some of the great men whom he so faithfully served in his young manhood.

In 1866 he returned to his State to fill the important position of collector of internal revenue. His rise was rapid. He soon became a leader, filling many important positions in his native State. He was first a director and afterwards president of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company. For six years he was a member of the house of delegates, two years of which he served as speaker of that body. For six years also he was a member of the State senate, until in 1881 he was elected to the United States Senate. Here his rise was rapid also. It was but a short time until he was regarded as one of the leaders of his party, and his advice was sought in every great movement for his party's success.

He was a master parliamentarian, and it was greatly through his skill and tactics that a minority was able to defeat in the Senate legislation hostile to his section. In 1889 he was made the leader of his party upon the floor of the Senate, leading them through many a storm to victory. But perhaps his greatest triumph, and one for which his party and the South owe him a lasting debt of gratitude, and one which she will never forget, was his magnificent leadership and the noble fight he made against the election bill. Under his leadership and directed by his skill the minority achieved a glorious victory and succeeded in defeating that bill, which even its friends now admit was not only unwise, but which would have proved disastrous to the South and perhaps caused a race war and bloodshed.

While Senator Gorman was gentle and kind in his nature, Mr. President, yet he was as courageous as a lion and determined whenever the occasion required. In the exciting days following the election of Grover Cleveland to the Presidency, when the result for days seemed in doubt and the leaders of the opposite party were making claims of victory, Senator Gorman was at the Democratic headquarters. He was on the watchtower day and night guarding his party's interests and infusing courage and determination in its leaders. He knew Mr. Cleveland was elected and was determined that the experience of 1876 should not be repeated; that the man elected by the people should be inaugurated their President.

In the last Presidential campaign he was again asked to lead his party, but on account of his failing health he was compelled to decline. Thus for a quarter of a century his advice and counsel was sought by the leaders of his party in the nation, while here his associates found in him a wise, safe, and sympathetic counselor.

The most striking illustration of his influence and the esteem in which he was held by his party associates on this floor is the fact that, having been retired for six years, upon his election in 1903 he was unanimously restored to his old leadership; and I doubt if the annals of the Senate will show a superior in parliamentary tactics. He was always in his seat, ever watchful of his party's as well as his country's interests, helpful and influential in shaping legislation and policies, sound in judgment, quick of perception, well informed upon all great questions affecting the Government. He was not only respected and followed by his party associates, but he always commanded the admiration of his opponents.

His voice is forever still; his labors and sorrows are over; but the memory of his good deeds and his public career will live in history. We indulge the hope that when the call came to pass over the dark river he was prepared to meet his Pilot face to face.

Sunset and evening star, And one clear call for me! And may there be no moaning of the bar When I put out to sea.

Twilight and evening bell, And after that the dark! And may there be no sadness of farewell When I embark.

For the from out our bourne of time and place The flood may bear me far, I hope to see my Pilot face to face When I have crossed the bar.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, other Senators have fully covered the facts in the life of our lamented colleague and have given voice to their feelings and love and respect. Each man who has spoken so eloquently in his praise has drawn a picture of his public characteristics and personal traits. I shall present another phase of his work and life.

In my long service with the Senator from Maryland I was always impressed with the completeness with which he illustrated the famous Latin maxim "Suaviter in modo, fortiter in Gentle in manners, resolute in deed. He was especially courteous and friendly in his dealings with all men. He was warm-hearted to a fault and ever ready to do a favor or an act of kindness. At the same time he was a man of great force and strength of character, ready to fight with all of his might for any cause in which he enlisted. He was especially qualified for leadership, because of the tact and skill with which he carried out his plans. He was a diplomatist of the very highest type, but was always loyal to his convictions. In those qualities which make for good leadership—judgment and a knowledge of human nature—he was especially strong and carried men along with him almost without their knowing it. I have never seen his superior as a party leader, and, though he made mistakes, as we all do, he was exceptionally free from the weakness which characterizes some men of blaming others for the blunders made.

In the history of the politics of his time he will always occupy a prominent place, and few men who have filled the high position of Senator exerted a weightier influence on legislation than did Senator Gorman. His greatest service, certainly one of the greatest achievements of his career, of which mention has been already made, was the defeat of the force bill, that bitter partisan measure which would have post-poned for years, if it had not absolutely destroyed, all chance for the happy condition and relation toward each other of the two sections of our great country which now exists. Had that bill passed sectional hatred would have flamed up into intensity as great or greater than existed at the close of the civil war, and strife and bloodshed would have followed on a scale which can only be conjectured. Its strongest advocates are now content to acknowledge that it was a great mistake to have ever undertaken to pass such a law. In proportion as this feeling of satisfaction shall grow Senator Gorman's services will stand out in bold relief and more and more entitle him to the admiration and respect of posterity for his great work in that great crisis.

There is another incident of his career that had as much or more than any other act of his life to do with making him, for the time being, unpopular with the unthinking masses and causing him to become the object of most bitter and vindictive criticism. I mean the charge, which, though not made in direct words, was unmistakably aimed at him, of being guilty of "party perfidy and party dishonor" in regard to the Wilson-Gorman tariff bill. It happens that I can bear personal testimony as to one of the most talked-of incidents in connection with that matter, and in discussing his career and contributing in ever so slight a way to a proper understanding of Senator GORMAN'S public work and statesmanship, I would feel recreant if I omitted to throw such light on this transaction as is in my power to do, and join the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Black-BURN] in protest against injustice to Senator Gorman's memory.

In October, 1892, I visited New York on business and remained in the city a week or more. I was at that time governor of South Carolina. Naturally I felt a most keen interest in the result of the approaching Presidential election. I visited the Democratic headquarters and had opportunity to talk with some of the leading men connected with the conduct of the Democratic campaign. There was intense interest and feeling in view of the well-known attitude of President Harrison on the force bill. I lived in a State where the negroes were in the majority and where we had suffered from negro domination. So I felt the deepest concern for the success of the Democratic party, feeling that the election of a Republican President at that juncture who favored the force bill would be nothing short of a I found there was great activity at headnational calamity. quarters, and frantic appeals were being made for campaign funds to strengthen the party in several doubtful States as well as in certain specified localites in New York State.

In the Southern States then-and, in a large measure, it is still true so far as that section is concerned—money exerted very little influence in elections; but realizing that things were different in the North, after talking with those who had charge of financing the campaign, I took immediate steps to have the chairman of the Democratic State committee of South Carolina exert himself to the utmost to obtain as much money as possible and forward it to Democratic headquarters. In the conversations which I had with the Democratic leaders it was clearly brought out that the sugar refiners were ready to contribute to the Democratic campaign fund if it could be understood that the industry would be fostered and not destroyed by the Democratic tariff policy, and I received the impression, which became indelibly fixed on my mind then and remains fixed to this day, that President Cleveland understood the situation and was willing to acquiesce in it if we won at the polls. I did not talk with Mr. Cleveland in person on this subject, though I called at his hotel to pay my respects, and I am thoroughly satisfied that the charge of "party perfidy and party dishonor" in the famous Wilson letter was an act of grossest wrong and cruelty to Senator Gorman. If Mr. Cleveland, as I was told, knew of these negotiations and was the beneficiary of such a contribution, it is inconceivable how he could lend his great name and influence toward destroying Senator GORMAN'S influence and popularity in the way he did. No wonder the Senator from Maryland, in the speech delivered in this body on July 23, 1894, made this indignant denial:

As I have said, sir, this is a most extraordinary proceeding for a Democrat, elected to the highest place in the Government, and fellow-Democrats in another high place, where they have the right to speak and legislate generally, to join with the commune in traducing the Senate of the United States, to blacken the character of Senators who are as honorable as they are, who are as particite as they ever can be, who have done as much to serve their party as men who are now the beneficiaries of your labor and mine, to taunt and jeer at us before the country as the advocates of trusts and as guilty of dishonor and perfidy.

When it is remembered that the placing of a duty on sugar.

When it is remembered that the placing of a duty on sugar under the Wilson-Gorman tariff as a substitute for the bounty system of the McKinley tariff was made necessary in order to get the votes of the two Louisiana Senators, it was easy to see that we either had to have no tariff legislation that session or the pledges made before the election had to be carried out. Gor-MAN, honorable man as he was, and party leader in the Senate of the Democrats, redeemed every pledge made by the party leaders in New York. There was something pathetic in the indignant words with which he met the charge of "party perfidy and party dishonor," which had been so unjustly hurled at him by President Cleveland. I quote from the same speech of July 23, 1894:

The junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. Smith], the junior Senator from Ohlo [Mr. Brice], and myself were then giving our time and our money and everything that men can give for the success of the party. We conferred with all those distinguished gentlemen. We were not at the conference with the candidate, but had from both sides what had occurred. They wanted to know if the Democratic organization, of which we were a part, put the same construction upon it and would be in favor of that line of procedure thereafter. They said to us frankly, "We want to tell our people the truth. We do not want to press you to give a single fraction of a cent to Louisiana, but we only want to know the truth." At that solemn conclave we all said, "Yes, it is a dutiable article; it is to be and must be the corner stone by which we will overthrow McKinleyism; you shall have it."

Mr. President, I would have given anything in reason for the interest of my people whom I represent if I could have had free sugar all along the line. I could not have it without violating the rule that I have made for myself, not to-day, but from the beginning of my career, for a fair revenue duty on all dutiable articles.

But above all, sir, in all my public career, no man, no living being, has ever charged me with perifdy. No soul can say that I ever made a promise about public or private matters that I did not carry it out if I had the power to do it. These two Senators and myself, carrying out our pledge, have stood here and been gibbeted as three men who were in a sugar trust. It is unnecessary to say no Senator on this floor with whom I am associated would believe such a thing, but it is due to the man who writes the history that he shall have the truth of the transaction.

The effect of these unjust and perfidious attacks upon Senator

The effect of these unjust and perfidious attacks upon Senator GORMAN was to give Maryland over to the Republican party for the time being and to send GORMAN into retirement; but with the indomitable will which always characterized him and a better understanding by the people of his State of the real facts in the case, after a period of retirement he was fully vin-dicated and returned to the Senate as Maryland's representative in this body. It is needless to say what gratification this afforded his party associates; and I feel it was also a matter for congratulation among his political opponents, for aside from party loyalty, which must characterize in a way all of our dealings with each other here, the personal bond is by far the strongest one in this great body, and men are judged and exert influence in a far greater degree by reason of their personal relations and characteristics than from any other cause. His departure from our midst has left a place vacant that few can fill; and those of us who had the privilege of knowing him intimately will always cherish the strongest feeling of admiration for the man as well as for the Senator. Always, Mr. President-

* * * He bore without abuse . The grand old name of gentleman.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, it is a custom honored in the observance to pay a just tribute to a member of the Senate when he has "walked the way of nature" and gone hence to be seen no more.

The colleagues of the late Senator Gorman have borne testimony, in no uncertain language, of the value of his public services in this body during his long tenure of the Senatorial office, and there is nothing left to be added to their estimate of his worth. I recognize, however, my duty, as a Senator from Maryland, to say a word on this sad occasion. Silence would be unjust to the memory of the dead and false to my own sense of manhood.

My first acquaintance with the late Senator occurred in the summer of 1871. He was then a young man 32 years of age, full of vigor and acuteness, after service as page and Postmaster of the Senate, and with keen knowledge of public affairs, acquired in the office of collector of internal revenue in the fifth district of Maryland. I was a candidate for the office of governor of Maryland, and promptly discovered in him an astute political leader, and our friendly relations began at that period.

He came to the house of delegates for the session of 1872, while I was governor, and was made its speaker. The duties of that position he discharged with signal ability, and what he had learned in the Senate, in the official position he held between 1862 and 1869, rendered him able to discharge the functions of the speakership without embarrassment.

After the session of the legislature he was made president of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company, in which the State had large interests, and for which position I rendered him all the aid in my power

About the year 1879, owing purely to political differences, the association in party affairs which had previously existed between us was severed, and our paths in party conferences thereafter ran in different directions; but I can with satisfaction say at this day that our personal relations were not suspended up to the hour of his decease. On the contrary, whenever we met was in the social and cordial way of former days. vate life was most exemplary, and his devotion to his home and his family won the admiration of his thousands of friends in his native State.

May he rest in peace!

And now, Mr. President, as a further mark of respect, I ask that the resolution I send to the desk be adopted by the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution submitted by the junior Senator from Maryland will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the Senate do now adjourn.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 7 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until tomorrow, Saturday, February 2, 1907, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 1, 1907.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, offered the following prayer:

We lift up our hearts unto Thee, O God and Heavenly Father, in behalf of the Member whose companion has been taken from him in death, and unto whom and his motherless children our hearts go out in tender and loving sympathy. Let Thine everlasting arms be about him to comfort and support him and speak to him.

O Thou grace divine, encircling all, A soundless, shoreless sea, Wherein at last our souls shall fall, Oh, love of God most free.

Speak to him, we beseech Thee, Thou who art the resurrection and the life, of that eternal home where families shall be reunited, and where sorrows and partings shall never come. And Thine shall be the praise, through Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, under the rules this day belongs to the Committee on War Claims. The committee does not wish to interfere with the river and harbor bill, and I ask unanimous consent that the day following the passage of that bill be given to the Committee on War Claims.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the day following the passage of the river and harbor bill may stand in lieu of to-day for business from the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I am unwilling to consent to that arrangement now. several other appropriation bills pending, and I think an arrangement may be made later by which we can set apart a day and observe a similar rule to that we had the other day in regard to claims, allowing the unobjectionable claims to be taken up. If this order requested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is made now it will result in nothing but the waste of a day on the omnibus bill

Mr. PAYNE. I think I shall have to object, Mr. Speaker, to this request now, but I think that an arrangement can be made later by which the gentleman will be enabled to get unobjectionable bills from the Committee on War Claims taken up.

COMMUTATION OF HOMESTEAD ENTRIES FOR TOWN-SITE PURPOSES IN OKLAHOMA.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 24989) to provide for the commutation for town-site purposes of homestead entries in certain portions of Oklahoma.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That when any citizen or number of citizens (not exceeding four) who have purchased homestends in Oklahoma Territory under act of June 5, 1906, entitled "An act to open for settlement 505,000 acres of land in the Klowa, Comanche, and Apache Indian reservations, in Oklahoma Territory," desire to found a city or town upon their said lands, it shall be lawful for them, at their option, to pay to the receiver of the land office of the district where their land is situated the full amount of the money remaining unpaid on their bid for their said land; and the person or persons so paying said money to commute their said homesteads shall at the same time file with the recorder of the county in which such city or town is situated a plat thereof for not exceeding 640 acres of land, describing its exterior boundaries according to the lines of the public surveys and of their homesteads; also giving the name of such city or town and a plat and description exhibiting the streets, squares, blocks, lots, and alleys, the size of the same, with measurements and area of each municipal subdivision, if any; the alleys, streets, public parks, and squares shall be designated, and the uses for which they are dedicated shall be given. Such map and statement shall be verified under oath by the party for and in behalf of the person or persons proposing to establish such city or town; and within one month after such fling there shall be transmitted to the General Land Office a verified transcript of such map and statement; accompanied by the testimony of two witnesses that such city or town has been established in good faith; a similar map and statement shall be filed with the register and receiver, and at any time after the filing of such map and statement in the General Land Office, together with the receipt of the receiver showing the aforesaid full payment of the bid made for such land, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to at once issue a patent to the sai

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Reserving the right to object, I would like to hear an explanation.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The object of the bill is this: Congress passed a bill on the 5th of June last opening for settlement 505,000 acres of land in Oklahoma. That land was to be sold to the highest bidder. It was sold recently and it brought $12 an acre on an average, some above and some below. It could not be sold for less than $5 an acre. It was sold under Since that time the railroad has been extended from my district in Texas in the direction of Lawson, one branch going 30 miles across this land to a town called Frederick. They find that there is no law permitting them to have towns along this route, or depots, or anything of that sort, and it is absolutely necessary that they should be permitted to pay the entire amount due on the land at one time so that a patent They bought the land on five years' time, paying can issue. one-fifth down and four other payments. They want the right to pay the other four payments and get the patents. are required to live on it fourteen months under the homestead law before they can commute. This permits them to commute at once on the payment of the amount due.

Mr. PAYNE. As I understand the gentleman, all this bill does is to permit the people to pay the whole consideration at once instead of five annual payments?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. LACEY. I would also state that these bids have not yet been filed and allotments made, but will be reported to the Secretary of the Interior in a few days. It only gives the option wherever they desire to lay out a town site by filing a plat and paying the full price of the bids.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to ask the gentleman if this has been reported from the Committee on Public Lands?

Mr. LACEY. It has.

I am glad to notice that the land sold for a Mr. PAYNE.

good deal more under sealed bids than $5 an acre.

We don't know how much it has brought, but Mr. LACEY. unquestionably it has brought more than it would if there had been a public auction and a combination of bidders.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to commend to the House the idea hereafter of selling land under the same rules and restrictions.

have no objection.
The SPEAKER.

The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

FIXING BOUNDARIES OF LANDS ADJOINING COEUR D'ALENE INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 24374, together with amendments, to fix the boundaries of the lands of certain landowners adjoining the Coeur d'Alene Indian Reservation, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That following the boundary of the Coeur d'Alene Indian Reservation, in the State of Idaho, wherever the surveys of said reservation, as finally approved, make it appear to the Commissioner of the General Land Office that adjoining owners of land would be deprived of a portion of their land as said land appears described under patent, such an amount of adjoining land shall be granted from the reservation to owners of such adjoining land as will complete their respective tracts as defined by patent or entry.

Add the following proviso to the end of the bill: "Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not extend to lands which are embraced in allotments made under the provisions of the act of June 21, 1906 (34 Stat. L., p. 335), or to lands in the use or occupation of any Indian having tribal rights on the Coeur d'Alene Reservation."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would ask what is sought to be accomplished by this?

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, the bill is simply a measure to correct the boundary lines between the prospective settlers that will be upon this reservation and the settlers who now own their land or have entered upon their land surrounding it. It has the unanimous support of the committee and of the Department, and it merely fixes a definite boundary line which will prevent future litigation over the exact boundary line between the two sets of owners.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. This has the unanimous support of the committee?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes. Mr. PAYNE. I have no objection.

ADDITIONAL LAND DISTRICTS IN ALASKA.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 25041) to provide for the creation of additional land districts in the district of Alaska, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Alaska, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there are hereby created two additional land districts, the boundaries of which shall be designated by the President, in the district of Alaska, to be known as the Nome land district and the Fairbanks land district, with the land offices located, respectively, at Nome, Alaska, and Fairbanks, Alaska.

Sec. 2. That the clerks of the district courts at Nome and Fairbanks shall respectively be ex-officio registers of the land offices at Nome and Fairbanks and the marshals of the said courts at Nome and Fairbanks shall be ex-officio receivers of public moneys for the Nome and Fairbanks land districts. Said officers shall perform the several duties of register of the land office and receiver of public moneys for the land districts with all the powers incident to such offices to the same extent as now performed by the register of the land office and the receiver of public moneys at Juneau, Alaska.

Sec. 3. That the said officers shall, in addition to their present compensation as clerk or marshal as provided by law, receive all the fees and emoluments allowed by law for their services as registers of land offices and receivers of public moneys for land districts under the land laws: Provided, That any fees or emoluments in excess of $1.500 per annum received by either such officials shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

Sec. 4. That the surveyor-general of the district of Alaska, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, shall furnish the receivers of said land offices a sufficient quantity of numbers to be used in the different classes of official surveys that may be made in said Nome and Fairbanks land districts to meet the requirements thereof, and upon application by any person desiring to have an official survey or to make the same, and such application, order, and the fee required to be paid to the surveyor-general in the district of Alaska shall be transmitted to the surveyo

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question about the bill. Does this propose to give two offices to these men-that is, to allow them to hold the office of marshal and also induct them into the office of receiver of the Public Land

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I will explain to the gentleman and to the House the situation. When Alaska first began to be settled and we organized a government there, there was not business enough to justify the establishment of a land office in the usual way; the expense was too great. So Congress made the usual way, the expense was too great. So congress made the secretary of the Territory and the clerk of the court register and receiver ex officlo, and allowed them to perform what few duties there were there. But at present they have a land office for the entire district at Juneau. The distance is very great, 2,500 miles from Juneau to Nome, and a good deal of the year it is practically impassable. It makes a great deal of delay in obtaining patents. A few years ago we established some land offices in northern Alaska, and it was found that there was not demand enough to justify keeping them open, and the expense of the offices was considerable. The fees were very few. Those offices were discontinued by act of Congress. They desire up there that they should have an opportunity to apply for their mineral patents in some more convenient way than going to The surveyor-general lives at Juneau. By making land offices at these two places and establishing them somewhat on the same plan that the original office used to be at Sitka, it will enable these people in the future cases that come up to obtain relief without the Government going to the expense of establishing separate land offices there, and therefore the bill makes the clerk simply do the duties of the register in addition to his present duties, and the marshal do the duties of receiver in addition to his present duties, and gives them the fees and commissions for the work, provided that they should not each exceed $1,500. They would probably amount to two or three hundred dollars a year.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Let me ask the gentleman this: Has not the office of receiver been abolished?

Mr. LACEY. It has not. Mr. UNDERWOOD. Has it not been consolidated, the two offices, in the United States?

Mr. LACEY. It has not, though it ought to be. I introduced a bill asking that that be done, but, unfortunately, I have not been able to secure a favorable report from the committee. My own judgment is that we ought to have the work of register and receiver performed by a single person, but this bill does not change that law. It simply makes provision for cases where if anyone wants a mineral patent he can apply and save the transfer of his papers back and forth 2,500 miles to Juneau, making a 5,000-mile trip by dog sled in the winter and by water in the summer time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection to that part of the The question with me was whether this was a bill to increase the emoluments of some official.

Mr. LACEY. It would increase them slightly. At Nome there are forty cases pending, and this bill provides that those shall be continued until finally settled at Juneau; but I suppose there will be fifty or a hundred cases from each of these points in the course of the next year or two. There are a number of miners who have low-grade claims that will have to be worked by dredging and by more expensive methods than the mere rocker-and-flume system. In order to do this they will have to go to the expense of buying dredges and putting in heavy machinery, and they require patents in order to do that. will not do that on titles which are or may be controverted, and it will settle costly conflicts as to titles.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection to that part of the bill, but I want to ask the gentleman this question: I have absolute confidence in the judgment and statement of the gentleman from Iowa, but I want to know whether he has investigated the question and whether he is willing to state to the House that you could not create the office of register and receiver separately from that of marshal?

Mr. LACEY. The marshal already handles funds there. is a bonded officer and handles very considerable funds, and he is on the spot. There are a clerk and marshal located at each of the cities of Nome and Fairbanks. There is none at Valdez, and it might be well to give some relief at Valdez if we ever have a court and court headquarters there. At present there are only deputies at Valdez. These officers can perform the additional duties, and would gladly do so, of course, for the compensation attached to them, and even the additional allowance, if it ran to the maximum, would not make a very large salary for Alaska.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The objectionable feature to the bill, it seems to me, is the consolidation of offices; of allowing one man to hold more than one office. As a matter of fact I doubt whether it is within the terms of the Constitution as a constitutional question, whether you have the right to confer two Federal offices on one man at the same time.

I think you can make a man perform additional Mr. LACEY. duties or authorize him to do so. At any rate, we did it in Alaska. We made the secretary of Alaska the register, and made the clerk of the United States court of Alaska a receiver, when the conditions at Sitka were very similar to what they are now at Nome or at Fairbanks, and it worked very well. There was no question raised about it, and I do not think any could be.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman recalls very well this House went into the question very fully in the case of General Wheeler, when the question was raised as to whether he could hold the office of major-general in the Army and a Member of Congress, and the Judiciary Committee of the House held that they were two separate and incompatible offices and could not be held by the same man at the same time.

Mr. LACEY. One of them was a constitutional office; that of Member of Congress.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think the Constitution says anything about a constitutional office, but merely provides no man shall hold two offices. Now, it seems to me that the office of United States marshal and the office of register or receiver are two distinct and separate offices, as recognized by the statutes of the United States, and it seems to me that the gentleman in his bill has encroached on that constitutional provision, and I wanted to know whether the gentleman had looked into the question from that standpoint.

Mr. LACEY. I have: and the secretary of the Territory was directed ex officio as such to perform also these other duties. So in the present case the clerk of the court, ex officio, will perform the duties of register.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 24991, the river and harbor appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 24991, the river and harbor appropriation bill, Mr. CURRIER in the chair.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri rose.

The CHAIRMAN. How much time does the gentleman from Missouri desire?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Thirty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for thirty minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, the chances are that anything said on the river and harbor bill after the learned speeches we listened to yesterday is a mere waste of breath, or to use a more elegant expression, a work of supererogation. Paul, the greatest philosopher that ever lived, in his first epistle to Timothy, says:

But if any provide not for his own, and specially for those of his own house, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel.

From the context it is clear that in that utterance the great apostle to the Gentiles was speaking of things spiritual, but it applies to things temporal as well.

The duties of Representatives here divide themselves about as follows: First, to the country at large; second, to the particular sections from which they hail; third, to the interests of their own districts; fourth, to look after the individual wants of their constituents. This last has been termed, flippantly, "doing errands in the Departments." Certain æsthetical doctrinaires, seated in comfortable libraries, who assume to run the affairs of this Government and of this world, condemn men in Congress who do anything else except expending their energies on the larger duties to the country. They would make solar-walk statesmen of us all-merely that and nothing more. tion and experience teach me, however, that the men here who attend to the duties of the country at large and to their own particular sections and their own districts and their own constituents with courage, capacity, and fidelity are the men who at last climb to high places in this House. The humblest man or woman in any district has the right to call upon his or her Representative for any proper service; and the Representative who is derelict in any of these duties falls short of doing what he is elected to do.

The most painful feature of this debate, so far as it has gone, is the fact that the distinguished chairman of this committee, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Burton], and my eminent colleague from St. Louis, Doctor Bartholdt, appear to have come to the parting of the ways. On the question of peace they have fought in pairs. Applicable to them on that subject is the old couplet:

Two souls with but a single thought, Two hearts that beat as one.

The difference between them on that question is that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Burton] speaks in favor of peace and votes against the implements of war, while the gentleman from Missouri, Doctor Bartholdt, speaks in favor of peace and votes for the implements of war. [Applause.]

Mr. BARTHOLDT rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] yield to his colleague?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. With pleasure.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. The desire of my colleague from Missouri to convict me of inconsistency is surpassed only by his unwillingness to understand my position.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I have not time to debate that question with the gentleman now. I have only thirty minutes. I am, however, willing to go into that some other time. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Bartholdt] on the question of peace seems to be in the same frame of mind as the Irishman who said he was in favor of a certain law, but against its enforcement. [Laughter.] I regard those two gentlemen as the advocates of peace par excellence, although those in possession of the funds have awarded the palm to the President of the United States. I congratulate him and the country on the fact that he has seen cause to dispose of the Nobel peace prize in a noble way. [Applause.]

The building or construction of great internal improvements is one of the grandest purposes to which any statesman can turn his attention. The kingdom of Alexander the Great has perished, the dynasties which his generals founded have gone the way of all flesh, but the public works which he established. especially the great city named for him, constitute his permanent monuments. The Roman Empire is broken into an hundred fragments; the Cæsars are dust; but the roads which the Roman legions built and over which they marched are still traveled by the children of men. The advocates of good roads in this country, of whom I am one, would do well to take lessons out of the book of the ancient Romans. My judgment is that if Napoleon had been let alone by England after the peace of Amiens, before he was dominated by the lust for universal conquest, he would have dedicated his mighty genius and prodigious energies to the establishment of such magnificent public works as would have ranked with the Code itself as his clearest titles to imperishable renown.

The truth is he snatched every moment he could from war to devote to the development of the resources of France. It was his design to build that canal connecting the Mediterranean with the Atlantic, which the French are agitating now. Ferdinand de Lesseps in the latter years of his life was imprisoned, as was the great Genoese navigator, but so long as ships go through the Suez Canal men will remember and bless his name. The crimson glory of Pultowa is dimmed by time, but so long as the proud city on the banks of the Neva lifts to heaven her spires the name of Peter the Great, who created her, will be familiar to the ears of men. No doubt Kaiser Wilhelm would count among the smallest of his achievements the canals he has dug and the canals in contemplation, but the chances are that when he is forgotten as a war lord these things will rank him among the greatest rulers of his time and associate his name indissolubly with those of his glorious ancestors, the Great Elector and Frederick the Great, the well beloved of the German

Out in the Mississippi Valley we have the most marvelous system of natural waterways that God, in His infinite wisdom and goodness, ever vouchsafed to any of His children. With signal stupidity we have neglected to improve them, and the Congress of the United States has acted toward them in a manner that is a shame to the Republic. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Burton] is said to dominate the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. I do not know anything about that. He may, and he The members of that committee are among the ablest may not. and most prominent in this body. However these things may be, I have a firmly grounded suspicion that on this occasion, on this bill, he and his committee dominate a majority of this House. If he is avaricious of fame—and his name has been sometimes used in connection with the Presidency of the United States-he has it in his own hands to build himself an imperishable monument by giving us deep water from the Falls of St. Anthony to the Gulf, thereby fixing his name onto that great en-It might possibly be that, in our intense desire to accomplish that, we might be willing to change the name of the Father of Waters to the river Burton, as it was originally called the river Colbert by the early French discoverers, in honor of the great French minister. That is his one chance to achieve a reputation that will never fade away.

Mr. MAHON. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If it is pertinent, yes.

Mr. MAHON. I want to ask the gentleman from Missouri if the present chairman of the River and Harbor Committee is not the most intelligent and best chairman that they ever had.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am not saying anything to criticise the chairman of that committee. I am giving him a pressing invitation to lay hold on earthly immortality. [Laughter and applause.] I esteem him as highly as any man in this House does. I admire his capacity and I believe in his integrity, but he is "sot in his ways," like the rest of us. I do not agree with his theories as to western rivers. I have a right to advocate my own.

Mr. MAHON. He is a bachelor. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am trying to convert him, and if he would establish that great work, when he had finished it he could repeat the proud boast of Horace:

Exegi monumentum æra perennius. I have reared for myself a monument loftier than the Egyptian Pyramids and more lasting than bronze.

Charles Stewart Parnell once said:

Opportunity is a horse, bridled and saddled, which stops at every man's threshold once in a lifetime. Be ready, mount, and he carries you on to success and honor. Pause but a moment—he is gone, and the clatter of his iron hoofs echoing down the corridors of time will forever remind you of what you have lost.

I commend these glowing words to the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors [Mr. Burton]. This is his golden opportunity.

First and last, Mr. Chairman, in the public prints there have been divers suggestions as to the post-Presidential career of the present occupant of the White House. Some have suggested that he go to the United States Senate. If New York intends to continue in the unfortunate habit of electing Republicans to the United States Senate, then my voice is for Roosevelt for that position. The subsequent proceedings would make what Horace Greeley would have denominated "mighty interesting Only two ex-Presidents have returned to Congress. reading."

John Quincy Adams served in this House seventeen and a fraction years, died with the harness on his back, as no doubt he would have desired to die had he been consulted as to his exit from this world; and it is the truth of history that more of his fame rests on the seventeen years of his service in this House than upon all of his long official career from the time when, at the age of 14, he became secretary of legation to the time when he quit the White House in high dudgeon, refusing to accompany his victorious rival, General Jackson, to the Capitol for inauguration. The people of Tennessee, after a prolonged and most dramatic contest, elected Andrew Johnson for a full Senatorial term after he was President. He only lived a few months. I wish he could have lived the full six years, so as to even up the score with his multitudinous enemies who undertook to impeach and convict him when he had committed no crime whatever. He was guilty of bad manners and lame grammar—worse.

and convict him when he had committed no crime whatever. He was guilty of bad manners and lame grammar—worse.

Another suggestion as to the President's post-Presidential career is that he shall be president of Harvard College. A noble ambition, surely. I would rather be president of the University of Missouri than to enjoy the high honor of being a member of the House or Senate or governor of that imperial Commonwealth. I regretfully realize that that desire of my heart can never be gratified because of the numerous and bitter political contests in which I have borne a part, and, I hope, a man's part. I look back upon the years I spent as a teacher with unalloyed pleasure. I was absolutely certain of doing good then. As a lawyer and a Representative I have done the best I could, according to my lights; but a lawyer is not always sure he has rendered society a benefit by acquitting his client, and a Representative in Congress, however honest and patriotic, may do his country a grievous injury by voting wrong on some great question for lack of correct information.

Another suggestion is that President Roosevelt shall devote his life to literature. He would have an immense audience to begin with and it would make him a fortune.

Another is that he shall be perpetual president [laughter] of The Hague Peace and Arbitration Tribunal. [Applause.] It is safe to say that he would discharge the functions of that exalted station with the energy and capacity with which he does everything to which he turns his hand; and what he would do to the other peacemakers who had plans of peace different from his own would be a plenty. [Laughter.]

Still another suggestion is that he be made general manager of the Panama Canal. Of all these propositions that would be to me the most tempting. To build an isthmian canal has been the dream of men since Balboa first looked down in amazement and delight upon the peaceful ocean, and if that stupendous work is a success, the man who accomplishes it will write his name upon the scanty list of the immortals. Why Shonts or Wallace or any other man that had a chance to associate his name with it should relinquish that opportunity for any financial inducement whatever is one of those things which, like the peace of God, passeth all understanding. [Laughter.]

My situation about this river and harbor bill is peculiar. I represent the great Mesopotamian district of the western world, wedged in between the Mississippi and the Missouri, skirting the Mississippi for 140 miles, skirting the Missouri for 150 miles, straddling the Missouri, and having in it six other rivers navigable by act of Congress. [Laughter.] There were seven, but I had one of them declared by act of Congress to be unnavigable for the purpose of building a railroad bridge across it. It was the first time I ever knew the railroads and the farmers to want the same thing at the same time, and I was so tickled by their wonderful unanimity that I pressed the bill through.

There is only one other man in this House whose district touches both the Missouri and the Mississippi, and that is my distinguished and well-beloved friend from St. Louis, Doctor Bartholdt. We Missouri Representatives have all done our best about improving the Mississippi and the Missouri—every one of us—Brother Ladyd, Brother Shackleford, and Brother Rucker, and Brother Fulkerson, and Brother Ellis, and the rest of those whose districts are on either of the great rivers, and the Missourians whose districts are not on the river, sympathizing with us, have helped us all they could, which is greatly to their honor.

We have 16,900 miles of navigable waters in the Mississippi Valley. If they belonged to Holland, there would be a granite dike on both sides of the Missouri River from Alton to Fort Benton. We might learn something from that thrifty and industrious people. With rare courage they rescued their country from the sea. Right now they are engaged in draining the Zuyder Zee at a cost of $99,000,000. Year by year land enough to make a State as big as Massachusetts is swallowed up by the Missouri and the Mississippi, and it is the richest land under the shining sum.

We annexed the Sandwich Islands on the excuse that we wanted homes for our children. We annexed the Philippines for the same reason. Why, Mr. Chairman, our children can not live in the Sandwich Islands or the Philippines. God Almighty knew as much as the jingoes when he was creating this world. [Laughter.] White men can do many things better than anybody else, but they can not work outdoors in the Tropics and thrive. We are tempting fate to try to do so. But here, year after year, millions of acres of land—in the last ten years enough to make a State the size of Missouri north of the Missouri River, that would easily support a population of 10,000,000 souls, right in the heart of the continent where white people were intended to live, amid churches and schools and all the facilities for civilization—fall into the Mississippi and the Missouri rivers, and roll down those great rivers to the Gulf.

James Parton, in his life of Andrew Jackson, one of the best biographies ever written by an American, makes the remarkable declaration that down below New Orleans you can still see the world forming, and it is forming out of the rich soil that sweeps down from Iowa, Missouri, Arkansas, and the other States in the heart of the great valley. We have spent first and last, and will spend, millions of dollars in irrigating the dry lands of the West. Why not make some provision for saving the fertile lands in the Mississippi Valley?

Senator isham G. Harris, a great man, was for a long time opposed to river improvement, but at last he gave in his adhesion to it on the theory that navigable streams belong to the United States Government, and it was the duty of Congress to keep the property of the United States from destroying the property of other people; just as Judge Culberson, another great man, used to defend the 20 cents mileage on the ground that although it did not cost that to come and go, the risks of travel were worth it. [Laughter.] There is a provision in this bill that I want to call your attention to—that none of these appropriations shall be used for the work of revetting the banks unless in aid of navigation. That being the case, if a man of common sense is permitted to construe it, every dollar of this appropriation might be used in revetment work, because there is no better way to aid navigation than by keeping this surplus silt from getting into the beds of the river. But the engineers do not so construe it. I will never forget that the engineers fought Capt. James B. Eads, the greatest engineer that ever lived, and his jetty system to the end.

I used to hear my father say that if all the scientists that ever lived were gathered together in convention, Sir Isaac Newton would be chairman of it by unanimous consent. I say that if all the engineers who have lived in all the flood of time were gathered together, James B. Eads, the great Missourian, by his service to mankind would deserve the chairmanship of that great conclave.

This bill provides more for the upper Mississippi than heretofore; it provides a little for the Missouri; it provides less than heretofore for the Mississippi from St. Louis to Cairo. One of two things ought to be done. There is no sense in any other position, I think, without criticising anybody at all. Either it ought to be definitely decided that these rivers are utterly unworthy of spending money on at all, or there ought to be a systematic and comprehensive programme entered upon so that each part shall be improved in harmony with the other parts and with the entire project.

The trouble about this river and harbor business is that they start in and appropriate money for a thing and quit it before it is completed. An improvement of a river that is needed is not a division of pork; it is a wise appropriation. A public building that is needed is not a matter of charity or of pork; it is a thing that ought to be constructed. A great many of us believe—and there is undoubtedly a great awakening on this subject all over the country—in the first place, that there ought to be a 14-foot channel from St. Louis to the Gulf—not to give people jobs, not to help a particular district, not to serve any particular interest, but to save money to every farmer and every merchant and every citizen who is in any way connected with the prosperity and business of the Mississippi Valley. That can be done, we ought not to spend any more money on it. If it can be done, there ought to be enough money spent, and it ought to begin at once, to accomplish that great work. That having been done, then the upper Mississippi ought to be improved to the Falls of St. Anthony.

The Missouri ought to be improved from its mouth to Fort Benton, and then if we want any more river and harbor work the Chicago drainage canal ought to be built; but my judgment is that there is no sort of sense in digging a channel to put the water into when you have a channel already nearly dug in the first instance. That ought to come after these others. It is objected that there is no freight that amounts to anything between St. Louis and Cairo. There was not any freight over what is now the line of the Pennsylvania Railroad until they built the railroad so freight could go over it. I say there is an awakening on the subject of river and harbor improvements the world around. There is that French canal of which I spoke a while ago. There is a canal talked about in Maryland. of Florida. There is a canal talked about in Maryland. There is a canal talked about across the Isthmus of Florida. There is a canal talked about in Maryland. That great man, President Diaz, is projecting canals in Mexico.

In Germany they are fixing to connect the rivers by canals, and the people are awakening to the fact that while the success of the railroads obscured for a while the fact that water transportation is five or six times as cheap as railroad transportation, water transportation is freight-rate regulation. The experience of the last year proves beyond all cavil that our railroads can not carry our freight. We must have more railroads or we must improve our rivers, and it is cheaper to improve the rivers than to build more railroads. Everybody knows that. We will agitate, we will agitate, we will agitate until we get needed and adequate river improvement. I am not threatening I wish to stir up the pure minds of Members and of anybody. I wish to stir up the pure minds of Members and of the people of the country, by way of remembrance, to the im-portant fact that the day is coming—it is almost here—when the Mississippi Valley will have a clear working majority of the Members of this House, and then we will be able to do as we please. [Applause.] Treat us well now and we will treat you well then. If we would stand together we could control affairs in the House now. In any event, it will not be more than fourteen years until we can control them easily.

There is one other feature of this matter that ought to be mentioned. I understand the case to be-and if I am wrong about it my friend from Alabama, Colonel Bankhead, or my friend from Mississippi [Mr. Humphreys] can correct methat down on the lower stretch of the Mississippi, below Cairo, the people by taxation or gift or in some other way have con-tributed about as much to the building of these levees as the United States Government has—about two to one, the gentle-man from Mississippi [Mr. Humphreys] informs me. Another sign of the times which indicates that people want water transportation is the fact that two or three years ago the people of New York, by an overwhelming majority, indorsed a proposition to expend $101,000,000 to deepen and widen the Eric Canal, which is the great monument to De Witt Clinton. New York sits by the eastern sea at the receipt of customs. She is the toll gatherer in the United States. We people out in the Mississippi Valley know that the natural way for our com-merce to seek the markets of the world is down the river to the Gulf and out to sea.

Hauling stuff from the Mississippi Valley to New York and the Atlantic ports is an unnatural and expensive performance and can not be long maintained. One other straw which shows how the wind blows is the fact that at the last session Congress granted a charter for the Lake Erie and Ohio River Water transportation is coming sure as we live, and Canal. coming with a rush.

As my time is about up, I want to say this: My friend Mr. LLOYD, on the upper Mississippi, has done all that he could for the appropriations there. The rest of us on the Missouri have done our best, including him, too, as a helper, to get all that we could for that. We will try to amend this bill when it comes to the reading by sections, under the five-minute rule, to suit our demands more thoroughly than it does at present; but we want it distinctly understood that if we do not get what we want in this bill, this agitation will be renewed as soon as this bill is passed and continued until we do get what we want in the way of river and harbor improvements out of the Congress of the United States. [Applause,]

Mr. RODENBERG rose.

The CHAIRMAN. How much time does the gentleman from Illinois require?

Mr. RODENBERG. About thirty minutes.

Mr. RODENBERG. Mr. Chairman, I would consider myself as wanting in loyalty and devotion to the material interests of the constituency which I have the honor to represent in this Chamber if I did not raise my voice in criticism of several features of this bill, and in giving expression to my opposition I know that I am voicing the sentiments of all the people of the Mississippi Valley and especially of the State of Illinois.

I desire, in the first place, to protest against the action of the committee in failing to include in this bill an appropriation of $3,000,000 to begin the construction of a navigable waterway 14 feet in depth from Lockport, Ill., by way of the Des Plaines, Illinois, and Mississippi rivers, to St. Louis, Mo. This proposed waterway, which is of such transcendent importance to the future development and disposition of the commerce of the Mississippi Valley, has received the unqualified indorsement of the great commercial, manufacturing, and agricultural interests of my State, and has been pronounced as entirely practicable by a board of competent engineers, who estimate its total cost at approximately $31,000,000.

Mr. Chairman, the Mississippi River and its tributaries drain the most fertile and productive section of the United States. In that basin are located twenty-two States of the Union, comprising two-fifths of the total area of the country and producing fully 75 per cent of all our merchandise exports. bulk of our agricultural wealth originates in these States, which contain two-thirds of all the manufacturing industries of the nation, the value of whose finished products reach the enormous total of $10,000,000,000 annually. When these facts are considered and when it is remembered that the Mississippi Valley is to-day the great central artery of our national activities, pulsating with industrial and commercial life, throbbing with the unmeasured wealth of the products of farm, mine, and factory, then indeed is it impossible to overestimate the value to the whole nation of this projected deep waterway which is destined ultimately to connect the Great Lakes with the Gulf of Mexico. It is, of course, an admitted fact that transportation by water is the cheapest transportation in the world. It is estimated that, on an average, the cost of transportation by water is less than one-third of the cost of transportation by rail. The market value of any article is based upon the cost of production added to the cost of transportation. It therefore follows that if there is a material reduction in the cost of transporting an article it will necessarily result in a material reduction in the market value of the article itself, and whenever you reduce the price of an article you benefit not only the consumer, but the producer as well, for you increase the demand for his product. To bring about these benefits it is incumbent upon Congress to enact legislation which will result in the improvement of our waterways, the great natural highways of commerce, and to make them available for the purposes for which they are plainly intended. The most serious handicap to-day on the productive capacity of the Middle West, and one which will continue to grow worse instead of better, is the inadequacy of our transportation facilities. The unprecedented prosperity which we have enjoyed during the past decade has advanced our produc-tion far beyond the point where it can be handled with any degree of expedition by the rallways of the country, and as we continue to increase in population there will be a corresponding increase in the volume of our traffic, and it will not be long until there will be an interruption in our prosperity due to the overtaxing of our channels of commerce and the physical inability to transport our products to the markets.

James J. Hill, who is without doubt our country's greatest authority on the question of transportation, in a remarkable speech before the Merchants' Club of Chicago last November, used these words:

To-day the entire country is suffering for want of transportation facilities to move its business without unreasonable delay. The prevailing idea with the public is that the railways are short of cars, while the actual facts are that the shortage is in tracks and terminals to provide a greater opportunity for the movement of cars.

Formerly the new mileage added yearly was about 4 to 5 per cent, or, with the increased capacity of cars, enough to keep pace with the growth of the country's traffic. In recent years the traffic has increased at a much higher rate. For instance, between Chicago and New York it has doubled in about eight years, while the facilities for handling it have not increased more than 12 or 15 per cent.

The country has to face a condition to-day which only time, patience, and the expenditure of enormous sums of money will remedy. To discuss this condition further would take more time than we can have to-night, and I will only say that there is no more important work for the General Government than the early construction of a canal from St. Louis to New Orleans with a depth of at least 15 feet. There is a crying need for such a canal now, and, bearing in mind the want of railway transportation, the sooner the work is commenced the better for the country.

Mr. Chairman. I have always believed that a continuation of

Mr. Chairman, I have always believed that a continuation of our national prosperity depends upon a commercial policy that provides a market for our products. Lying at our very doors are the states of Central and South America, which present a most inviting field for our exploitation. It is a rich and fertile field, possessing unlimited commercial possibilities, and its trade should belong to us as a matter of natural right on account of our close proximity and friendly relations. Only recently our great Secretary of State, Elihu Root, completed a tour of these states, and the beneficial effects of his visit are already beginning to manifest themselves. He has sown the seeds of amity and good will, which should, under proper cultivation, ripen into the fruit of commercial supremacy. To insure this, however, and to make effective the ultimate object of the distinguished Secretary's South American policy, we should provide facilities necessary to transport our products to the markets of our southern neighbors. The construction of this deep waterway or interior harbor, reaching from the Lakes to the Gulf, will alone supply these facilities and secure for the United States the commercial advantage in Central and South America to which our favorable location fairly entitles [Applause.]

In a speech delivered in the city of Chicago not later than last Saturday night Theodore P. Shonts, speaking on this subject, said:

The beneficial effects of such a harbor are many and obvious. In the first place, it would furnish opportunities for the creation of terminal facilities along its entire length. In the second place, it would build up and develop the entire Mississippi Valley by giving it the advantages of terminal ports brought close to its doors. In the third place, and this has a most direct bearing on our canal proposition, it would give the people of our great Middle West, with their geographical proximity and these superior transportation facilities, a distinct advantage over the rest of the country in commanding the South American trade.

It will, of course, be argued by the gentleman in charge of this bill that we should be satisfied for the present with the appropriation of $190,000 for a deep-water survey from St. Louis to New Orleans. I for one am not satisfied and the people of the Mississippi Valley are not satisfied. We do not believe in further procrastination. We are unanimously of the opinion that the time is at hand when the work of actual construction of this deep waterway should begin. The imperial city of Chicago has expended $50,000,000 of her own money to construct and maintain a drainage canal which she is ready to donate to the United States if the Government will guarantee to construct and maintain deep water from the Lakes to the Gulf. It is a proposition of which we should avail ourselves. gress should not hesitate to continue the work so magnificently begun by Chicago. A start should be made, and made without delay, and in the eternal fitness of things that start should be made between Chicago and St. Louis, the two most important cities of the Mississippi Valley. [Applause.] I am aware that a certain official body known as the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, having its headquarters in the city of Washington, recently reported adversely on this proposed project on the ground that the probable amount of commerce that would use this waterway and the resulting benefits to the people from a business standpoint would not warrant the expenditure by the General Government of $30,000,000. Mr. Chairman, I have no criticism to make of any member of the Corps of Engineers who confines his activities to his legitimate sphere of usefulness. I believe that taken as a whole the engineers of the United States Army possess an exceptionally high degree of technical and scientific skill, and I know that the present head of that great department, Gen. A. Mackenzie, is justly regarded as one of the ablest engineers in this country. I have no doubt but that the members of the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, who sit in solemn judgment on the recommendations of the local engineers, are fully qualified to pass intelligently on any of the physical phases of a proposition of this character. They no doubt have the technical knowledge that would enable them to estimate the cost of construction within a fraction of a dollar. On a question of this struction within a fraction of a dollar. On a question of this kind, which presupposes a comprehensive knowledge of the science of engineering, their recommendations are entitled to great weight by Congress. But when it comes to giving Congress gratuitous advice on a purely commercial or business proposition, then indeed are we justified in inquiring, "Upon what meat doth this our Cæsar feed, that he is grown so great?" This august board is composed of the following gentlemen: Col. D. W. Lockwood, Lieut, Col. R. L. Hoxie, Maj. C. McD. Townsend, Maj. E. Eveleth Winslow, and Capt. Charles W. Kutz. All of them are graduates of West Point, and they have continued uninterruptedly in the service of the Engineering Corps since graduation. Not one has ever had any practical business experience of any kind, and I seriously any practical business experience of any kind, and I seriously doubt whether any one of them is able to differentiate between a railway tariff and a tariff schedule. Is it possible that Colonel Lockwood, of the Engineering Corps, is better qualified to pass on the commercial advantages of this deep-waterway project than James J. Hill? Is Lieutenant-Colonel Hoxie, of the Engineering Corps, more experienced in business matters than gineering Corps, more experienced in business matters than Theodore P. Shonts? Does Major Townsend, of the Engineering Corps, know more about the proper remedy to relieve the congestion of traffic in the Mississippi Valley than William K. Kavanaugh, of St. Louis? Has Major Winslow, of the Engineering Corps, a better conception of the requirements of trade than David R. Forgan, of Chicago? Does Captain Kutz, of the Engineering Corps, possess knowledge superior to that of M. J. Sanders, of New Orleans, on a question relating to the improvement of transportation facilities? In the language of improvement of transportation facilities? In the language of the iridescent Ingalls, it is the "very apex of effrontery, the climax of audacity," for these gentlemen of the Engineering Corps to arrogate to themselves the right to pass judgment on a matter wholly outside the province of their profession and

ing or experience. [Applause.]
But, Mr. Chairman, there is still another phase of this question that I wish to discuss briefly. I believe that the construction of this deep waterway would have a very appreciable effect on prevailing railway freight rates. It would create a large number of independent carriers on a common highway and introduce a most effective competition, which would prove highly beneficial to the shippers of the Mississippi Valley. This is the firm belief of the advocates of the deep-waterway project and, as an evidence of that belief, they have adopted as their slogan in this campaign of education the motto: "River regulation is rate regulation." They believe, and rightly so, that competition of this kind will exert far greater influence and prove far more effective in controlling freight rates than any rate bill that could be passed by Congress. They believe also that it would stimulate our shipping industry and add materially to the number of craft upon American waters. There are to-day in the neighborhood of 3,200 American vessels on the Great Lakes. If we had a channel of sufficient depth from the Lakes to the Gulf to enable these vessels to pass through, the majority of them could and would be employed during the time that navigation was closed in the lake region, in the coastwise trade, or in the Central and South American trade. The tremendous commercial possibilities involved in this proposed project and the resulting benefits to the American people are beyond the powers of calculation. With the single exception of the United States, every country of any consequence has long since adopted a systematic method of developing and improving its waterways. Practically every river in Germany and France and England has been deepened, and a network of canals has been built which connects the majority of them. The people of the countries of Europe realize that their continued industrial success depends in a large measure upon cheap transportation, and they are quick to improve the facilities which nature has placed at their disposal. It is high time that the United States, the most progressive and enlightened of nations, should wake from its lethargy and inaugurate a similar policy on a broader and a grander scale, for in that policy lies the future pros-perity of the American people. We are spending millions upon millions upon our Navy and upon the national defense. Fully 40 per cent of our national expenditures go to the Army and Navy, in preparation for war and its results, although we claim to be a nation of peace. Let us call a halt in this ambitious programme and begin the long-delayed work of internal improve-

Let us do that which will enhance our material welfare and contribute to the happiness of our homes. I sincerely hope that the amendment which will be offered by my colleague, Mr. Graff, and which provides for an immediate appropriation of $3,000,000 to begin work on this deep-water channel will receive the support of a majority of this House.

And now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to direct attention to another feature of this bill which especially affects several of the counties of the district which I represent and which border on the Mississippi River. I refer to the appropriation provided for the secret the sixty of the secret the secret that the secret the s for that part of the river lying between the mouth of the Ohio and the mouth of the Missouri. Under the policy of the engineering department, inaugurated in 1881, which had for its purpose the confinement of the flow of the river to a single channel having an approximate width of 2,500 feet below St. Louis, much work in the nature of permanent improvement has been accomplished. Dikes and hurdles have been constructed. banks have been revetted, and the channel has been deepened by the use of dredges. To do this work Congress has, during the past four years, given us an annual appropriation of $650,000. In the report of the Chief of Engineers for 1906 it is specifically recommended that a like appropriation of $650,000 be made for this year to enable the local engineers at St. Louis to continue the work of dredging and to carry out such temporary and permanent channel improvements as may be authorized by law. The committee, however, which profess such sublime confidence in the judgment of the Corps of Engineers in other matters, have seen fit to turn a deaf ear to this request. Instead of giving us the amount which the local engineers, who are familiar with the situation, say is necessary to do this work properly, the committee have cut down the appropriation from $650,000 to $250,000, and that, too, in face of the fact that the bill which they have reported to this House carries the largest appropriation that was ever carried in a river and harbor bill. I maintain that the action of the committee is arbitrary and unjust and does violence to every consideration of fair dealing. Instead of decreasing this appropriation, in justice to the great interests affected, in justice to the farmers living along the stretch of the river, whose crops have been destroyed and whose lands have been washed away by reason of the parsimonious policy of Congress, which prevents the construction and maintenance of such permanent improvements as will confine the river to its channel, the appropriation should have been increased to not less than $1,000,000 annually. The Government exercises exclusive jurisdiction over all navigable streams, but in the exercise of that jurisdiction the people have a right to insist that the Government should perform its plain duty, and that a sufficient sum of money should be forthcoming from the National Treasury to render impossible the all too frequent shifting and changing of the river's channel which has so often resulted in the complete obliteration of vast areas of valuable farm lands, carrying ruin and desolation in its wake.

I am aware that under the present policy of Congress all appropriations for the improvement of navigable rivers are based upon the theory that such appropriations must be wholly and exclusively in the interest of general commerce and navigation, and that any protection that may thereby accrue to contiguous lands is merely incidental. While I have always regarded this policy as cruel and heartless in the extreme, and while I hope to see it reversed in the not far distant future, yet I am willing to accept it without protest at this time if Congress will authorize an appropriation sufficient to meet the present manifest exigencies of the commerce and navigation of that part of the Mississippi River lying between the mouth of the Ohio and the mouth of the Missouri. I will accept it because I believe that if sufficient money is placed at the disposal of the local engineers to enable them to carry out the plan which was begun in 1881 and which, as I stated before, contemplated the confinement of the river to a single channel, it will afford a most substantial measure of security and protection to the farmers of the American bottoms. I believe that they are fairly entitled to this protection, which, in the very nature of things, would be only incidental to the present very urgent work required by the necessities of commerce and navigation. beggarly pittance of $250,000 is wholly inadequate for our It is scarcely enough to pay the expense of dredging work. It will leave us practically nothing with which to maintain even our present limited permanent improvements, and it will render us utterly powerless to inaugurate any new or temporary work, no matter how serious or threatening the situation may become.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman-

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. RODENBERG. I yield.
Mr. GARRETT. I desire to ask the gentleman if you have, above the mouth of the Ohio River, any local levee boards?

Mr. RODENBERG. Yes, sir; we have.

Mr. GARRETT. You have local levee boards?

Mr. RODENBERG. Yes, sir; we have levee districts each of which is controlled by a board of commissioners, consisting of three members, who are elected to these positions.

Mr. GARRETT. I simply desired to ask that one

Mr. GARRETT. I simply desired to ask that question. Mr. RODENBERG. Between St. Louis and Cairo the Between St. Louis and Cairo the country has been divided into a large number of levee districts. The farmers have taxed themselves hundreds of thousands of dollars to construct substantial levees to protect their lands against overflows. They have done this cheerfully and with full reliance in the expressed intention of the Government to exert every effort in its power to confine the river to a single channel. The Mississippi River, gentlemen, is an erratic stream. It has contracted the pernicious habit of manifesting a wanton disregard for many of the recognized laws of the science of engineering. New channels are formed in a single night, and long-established landings are destroyed within a week. Only last summer the river suddenly changed its course, and in an incredibly short time several thousand acres of magnificent farm lands were washed away and the river came within 50 feet of the great Harrisonville levee, which was built by the farmers of Monroe County at an approximate cost of $100,000. Fortunately for us, at that time there were funds available for the work necessary to turn the river back into its original channel, thus preventing the complete destruction of the Harrisonville levee and the loss of many thousands of dollars in crops, live stock, and farm property. If this meager appropriation of $250,000 is permitted to stand, we will not be prepared to meet an emergency of this kind in the future, but we will be entirely at the mercy of the river.

Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Rivers and Harbors have deemed it right to incorporate a provision in this bill calling for an expenditure of $1,210,000 to construct a harbor at Cold Spring Inlet, New Jersey. I am informed by gentlemen who are supposed to have knowledge of the facts that not a single ton of freight has ever been or will ever be shipped from this harbor, but that it is to be constructed for the purpose of providing a safe haven for the private yachts of millionaires who are expected to build palatial homes on meadow lands that are now practically worthless, but which are being developed by a syndicate of practical Pennsylvania politicians incorporated under the name of the Cape May Realty Company. If this be true, and if in the opinion of the committee such unexampled generosity toward a project of pleasure and private profit is justifiable, then, in God's name, why this outrageous discrimination against the legitimate business interests of the Mississippi River? According to the commercial statistics compiled by the Chief of Engineers, the receipts and shipments of freight at St. Louis, including transfers by ferries, in the year 1905 amounted to 7,125,103 tons. The shipments from landings between Cairo and St. Louis increased from 17,179 tons in 1902 to 69,729 tons in 1905, or over 300 per cent. It is for this steadily increasing volume of business that I enter a plea here to-day. On behalf of the manufacturers, the merchants, and the farmers of the Twenty-second Congressional district of Illinois I ask that the proposed appropriation of $250,000 for the improvement of the Mississippi River from the Ohio to the Missouri be increased to $1,000,000. I ask this as a matter of right and in a spirit of absolute justice and common fairness. [Applause.]

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I propose to address my remarks to the amendment hereafter to be offered to this bill which will provide for the commencement of a deep waterway from the Lakes to the Gulf. I understand that a great many Members of this body regard the commencement of this waterway with considerable apprehension, because it means that when the country starts upon this project it starts upon a project of large size. In its plunge through the centuries the world has reached a new era-the water-controlling period of the worlda time when men quit talking about what can be done with rivers and canals, and a time when men commence to do something.

Twenty-four hundred years ago, in the time of Alexander the Great, they discussed the project of building a ship canal across the isthmus in Greece. Four hundred years later, in the time of Nero, they commenced to build it, and at intervals from that time until the present time they worked upon it; but the present generation built it. For a thousand years the world talked about the Suez Canal; but the present generation built it. In the time of Julius Cæsar they talked about the great Manchester Ship Canal; but the present generation built it. In the time of the Roman occupation of Gaul they talked about the great German ship canal; but the present generation built it. In the time of the Pharaohs they discussed the subject of controlling the flow of the river Nile; but the men who built the pyramids could not and did not undertake that great project, and it remained for a commercial nation of the present age to build the greatest dam ever constructed by man, and now the flow of that ancient river through its fertile valley is absolutely controlled. For four long busy centuries the world has talked about the Panama Canal, and now the greatest nation in all the world proposes to build it. [Applause.] There is no scheme at the present time in the matter of waterway improvements too great for this nation to attempt.

Since the era of railroad building commenced in the world the English-speaking nations of the world have not been alive to the importance of waterways, and not long ago in a London periodical Arthur Lee called attention to the fact that the railroads of England had acquired nearly one-third of the mileage of the English canals and had succeeded in crippling the entire system; and at the present time a royal commission by authority of Parliament is conducting in England the most careful river and artificial waterway examination ever inaugurated by any nation, and the object is to determine whether there shall be a government ownership of all the canals there or a government ownership of all the railroads there. Not long ago we passed through the Congress a bill which has for its object the regulation of railroad rates, but as the years pass the country will find out that this attempt will prove to be a failure. You can not regulate the price of a bushel of wheat by law and you can not regulate the price of carrying a bushel of wheat a thousand miles by law, and you never will be able to do it. The only way to regulate the railroads of this country is to restore to these noncompeting railroad systems the competition they ought to have. You can not do that except by improving our rivers and harbors, except by developing the 16,000 miles of navigable rivers in the center of this great continent.

As we enter upon the water-controlling period of the world we enter upon another equally important period. The racial migrations which began centuries ago when the world was young have belted the globe, and to-day this country has completed the last link of this chain, and we are endeavoring in the islands of the sea, close to the cradle of the race, to implant our theories of government—our ideas and our ideals. In the march around the world racial migrations have moved always along east and west lines, but when a country is settled up, when a great section is settled up, the movement changes and there comes a north and south movement. In this country the men who live along the fortieth parallel in the State of New York, and along that same parallel in the State of Illinois, and along that same parallel in the State of California are engaged in about the same kind of occupations, producing about the same kind of things. There is no reason why the products of New York and the products of the same zone in Illinois and the products of the same zone in California should be exchanged. But for a long time in this country, compelled by the east-to-the-west movement of the population, the movement of commerce has also been along east and west lines, made necessary by the fact that the raw material of the West must be exchanged for the manufactured product of the East.

But we have reached the end of that movement now. The east to the west movement in this country is over, and the north to the south movement has commenced here and all over the world. Even in darkest Africa they still cling fondly to the "Cairo to the Cape" railroad theories of the great Cecil Rhodes.

In this country we have no more free lands to give away, and just this side of the Rocky Mountains the racial migration has been deflected and is pouring now into the wheat fields of Canada. And the real north and south movement is on. Whenever a country is settled up the east to west movement of com-merce ceases and the north and south movement commences and this always has been and always will be the natural movement of commerce-in order that the products of colder climes may be exchanged for the products of warmer climes. In the cities of the Pacific coast they are organizing now companies for the purpose of colonizing far-off sections in South America.

Simultaneously with the conclusion of the east to the west movement and the west to the east movement in this country, the country awakes to the fact that we have expanded within our natural boundaries until we have touched on either side the two great oceans of the world—the two great north and south highways of the world-easily accessible to all that portion of our population which lives between our mountain ranges and the seas, and we are awaking to the fact that between our mountain ranges this country has been supplied with the grandest river system on the globe, reaching every one of the Mississippi Valley States, and every one of these rivers flows from the north to the south. I have displayed upon this easel here in front of the Speaker's desk a map prepared by the Geo-logical Survey from data furnished them by me, which shows the tendency of the north and south movement in this country. Up here in Canada the Province of Ontario is building from North Bay to Fort Churchill, North Bay being the northern terminus of the Grand Trunk Railway, a railroad, and has entered already upon that project. The Canadian Northern Railway is building from Winnipeg to Fort Churchill, upon Hudson Bay, at the present time another railroad, and they have completed over 200 miles of it, and to-day, through the great white mantle which covers the immense domains of Canada in that section, this road is being built at the rate of 3 or 4 miles a day, piercing the snows of the north on its way up to Fort Churchill. This road, it is expected, will be finished and in operation when this year's wheat crop is ready for the market. The Saskatchewan and Hudson Bay Company are building another railroadand they have commenced upon that project already-from Edmonton north to Fort Churchill. These places on Hudson Bay are, of course, farther north than represented here on this map. The Northern Pacific Railway has surveyed a line from Devils Lake, N. Dak., all the way up to Fort Churchill, and within the next year, my information is, they will commence the construction of this north to the south railway.

Now, the reason for all this northward movement is this, that for the last two or three years the Canadian government has been investigating the possibilities of Hudson Bay, and they have found that away up there at Fort Churchill, itself within the wheat country of the north, is one of the greatest landlocked harbors on the globe. They have found that Hudson Bay is open from the middle of July to the middle of November of each year, and can be kept free from ice for a longer period than that by using ice crushers similar to those now in use on the St. Lawrence River or on the Great Lakes; and so, piercing the great wheat country of the north, these railroads are being built. Hudson Bay, the third in size and importance of the world's great inland seas, cleaves the continent of North America for a thousand miles. These railroads will be quickly built.

There are no engineering difficulties to overcome, no great rivers to cross, no mountain ranges to pierce. They are being built by modern methods over a level plain, and we may expect them to be in operation soon. It is a thousand miles nearer from Winnipeg to Liverpool by the Hudson Bay route than by any other route. Canada, alive to the possibilities of water transportation, is seeking now the shortest and cheapest road to the sea.

What is to become of this great Red River wheat country of ours up there in the Northwest, when by this cheaper method of transportation the Canadian wheat fields become its competitor in the markets of Liverpool. There is no relief for that great section except to provide for it the same cheap method of reaching the ocean highways of the world. And you can not do that except by finding a way out through these lakes, down through the Illinois River and the Mississippi River, down also from the upper Mississippi River and from the Missouri River country to the southern Gulf. All the other outlets from the great interior of this continent to the sea, and there are only two other outlets, are controlled by the Canadian Government.

The city of Winnipeg is increasing in population at the rate of 30,000 a year and is building at the rate of $1,000,000 a month. There were days last year when her receipts of wheat from this as yet undeveloped wheat section exceeded the combined receipts of Duluth, Minneapolis, and Chicago.

I expect to insert here some practical suggestions from two practical business men in my district as to the importance of sufficient inland waterways. There is presented in these two letters I have here the subject in a more forceful way than I could ever expect to be able to do. The subject is presented from the standpoint of business men who have had experience and who know what they are talking about.

The following are the letters referred to:

DEAR SIR: Your favor at hand and fully noted.

point where there are rallroads will be a receiving and distributive point.

And the result as to the use of the cars will be that the same car can be used several times more than at present where freight is transported in same car hundreds of miles and cars are on the way from ten days to sixty days and perhaps carry freight only one way.

The present way of handling the freight of the country is like the unorganized mob at a fire where each person selzes a bucket and fills it and runs to the fire to pour it on the fire instead of forming a line and passing the buckets of water from the pump to the fire. The railroads of this country are talking of the necessity of building 75,000 miles of railroad to meet the freight requirements of the country at the cost of billions of dollars. It does seem that the Government ought to improve its natural highways with a few millions, so as to reduce the necessary great outlay of the railroad systems as much as possible. The people have to pay for this and they are entitled to the cheapest transportation that can be given them.

Chairman Burton certainly does not rise to the seriousness of the situation if he does not include a recommendation for the Illinois and Mississippi Valley waterway to have an appropriation.

Washington, D. C.

Dear Sir: Our junior has written you something about the natural waterways and the canals, and I would like to add a little to the same, as I have been in the trade longer here and shipped a great deal of grain by water from this point. We once, before the close of the war, made a shipment of thirty canal boats of bulk corn Havana to New Orleans, the first bulk grain to go to that point. There were then no facilities there, and the grain was sacked and carted to all manner of storage places about the city and much of it reshipped to New York City via the Gulf and Atlantic route.

In later years we have shipped bulk grain there in large barges during the months of March and April—as much as 32,000 bushels on a single barge.

We loaded two barges, one with this amount and another with 22,000 bushels, in three days, at one time, that went direct to New Orleans, the St. Louis inspector inspecting it here. It was said to be destined for Habana. Cuba, and broke bulk at New Orleans. Then it was a custom to ship most of the winter receipts by canal boat, either to Chicago or St. Louis, in the early spring, at rates the railroad could not touch at that time. Indeed, we have shipped by water at lower rates to Chicago than we have enjoyed by rail at any period. But the low water in the summer made transportation in anything like large quantities (full cargoes) impossible, and boats began to go out of commission, as they could not afford to remain idle so much of the year. The canal itself never permitted a full cargo to be taken to Chicago, as we were limited to 4½-foot draft, we think. It has been some years since we have shipped a cargo of grain ourselves, but since the Chicago Drainage Canal has turned water in the river there has been a better depth of water all through the season than known in earlier years.

since we have shipped a cargo of grain ourselves, but since the Chicago Drainage Canal has turned water in the river there has been a better depth of water all through the season than known in earlier years.

There were once large fleets of boats owned by individuals that depended entirely on chartering for loads of lumber in Chicago and stone at Joliet for down river and grain back to Chicago or St. Louis. At present there is hardly a boat captain that owns his own boat. There are two firms at Pekin, Ill., that own a system of barges, and I think one controls the remnant of the canal fleet that was formerly at Henry. They do a large business now, up and down the river, carrying all grain to Pekin, right by the large market at Peoria, which has now no elevator with a river leg. In low water the boatmen used to have strenuous times, both above and below us, that the building of the dams did not cure. With an improved waterway and increased capacity of cargo for boats, it would again be a profitable or remunerative business. It is supposed to pay these Pekin people, because they enjoy some privileges in the way of eastern shipment, taking a so-called "river rate," this grain being counted as something that the eastern roads would otherwise never have a chance to carry. In the past it has been carried on a special "river rate" to eastern points. At least we so understand to be the case. Before the interstate bill was passed, Havana, Pekin, and Peoria also enjoyed rates of a special nature, called "river rates," which were about 5 cents or 5 to 8 cents per 100 less than rates named on the lines that carried the grain from points on their own lines farther east. Natural competition made such a ruling, and exceptions should be made.

But this is getting away from the waterways to the rallroads, and what we want to impress upon you is that the waterway routes have been a great freight regulator and made rates cheaper. For instance, there was a time when almost all freight east of Pekin, Peoria, and Havana that went to

I want to call attention now to some of the canal work done in Canada. I have made this statement in other cities, and some of the great newspapers have taken issue with me, Already in Canada they have secured their 14-foot outlet all the way from Port Arthur, up there on Lake Superior, out to the sea. They have improved the St. Lawrence River until it is navigable now for boats drawing 14 feet of water—and a boat that draws 14 feet of water is an important craft in the commerce of the world. Recently a vessel accomplished the voyage around the north part of North America and discovered the Northwest Passage, the most difficult voyage, perhaps, ever undertaken by any vessel—the dream of a hundred years has been realized—and the vessel which accomplished that great feat drew less than 14 feet of water.

The entire wheat crop of California is carried in sailing vessels thousands of miles around the continent of South America to Liverpool, and the greater part of these vessels draw less than 14 feet of water. And this cheap method of transportation makes wheat worth more at the place of production in California than at any other producing point in any other State. Give us this channel and an ocean-going river steamboat will soon make itself felt in the commerce of the world. Breaking bulk at New Orleans, with the modern floating elevators in use there, is, however, not a particularly expensive proposition.

Not long ago there was organized in the city of Chicago, soon after the completion of the enlarged Welland Canal, in 1900, a company to transport grain from Chicago, without breaking bulk, to Liverpool; and the vessels belonging to this company made two or three trips all the way from Chicago, through the Laurentian system of canals, and unloaded their wheat at Liverpool. All of them drew, of course, less than 14 feet. But a hand of iron reached out and crushed that enterprise. Marine insurance companies put upon it a ruinous rate of insurance. From another direction there came a stronger source of opposition. These boats were sold, and this scheme was abandoned, and this new trade route has never yet become operative. The real reason for abandoning this enterprise remains something of a mystery to this day. I have always had a suspicion that the railroads of the country had something to do with it. I addressed a letter recently to Hon. O. P. Austin, Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, asking for information upon this matter. This competent and courteous official is always able to furnish all obtainable information and statistics upon any commercial subject. He conducts one of the most important and useful bureaus of the public service. His services are most valuable to the Members of this House and to the country. I received from him the following reply, which tends to confirm my suspicions. I expect to devote to this question at some future time some further research.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE AND LABOR,
BUREAU OF STATISTICS,
Washington, January 4, 7967.

Bureau of Statistics,

Washington, January 4, 1997.

Dear Sir: I have your letter of the 2d and am pleased to know that the information supplied you with reference to the shipment of wheat from California and freight rates was satisfactory.

Replying to your inquiry regarding the experiment made with ships cleared at Chicago for Liverpool via the Welland Canal and St. Lawrence River and canals, I can only say that I wrote the parties in Chicago who made the experiment and was informed by them that it was not a success. As I am unable to recall their names, I am not able to find their letter or even my own letters to them, but my recollection is that they stated that the failure was due, in part at least, to the very high insurance rates which they were compelled to pay on the grain passing through the canals, and that I also received an intimation in some way, whether from them or not I am unable to say, that these excessive rates required of them may have been made at the instance of some unknown parties, who preferred that this system should not be built up as a rival to the other carrying systems. How much there was in this last suggestion I, of course, do not know. I think you would be able to learn from some of the Chicago people, probably the Chicago custom-house officials or some of the grain experience, the names of the parties who made this experiment and learn the facts more in detail from them; but my recollection is very distinct that they reported that the experiment was not a success and that they had decided to abandon it and put the vessels into service, I think, on the Atlantic coast, and that the high rates of insurance had at least something to do with the inability of this proposed system to compete with the systems already in existence. I also infer that the size of the ships which they were able to use for the canal transit was not sufficiently large to enable them to carry at proportionately low rates along the Lakes and across the Atlantic.

Regreting my inability to give you more defini

O. P. AUSTIN, Chief of Bureau.

Hon. Henry T. Rainey,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

Do you gentlemen know what can be accomplished in 14 feet of water? The greatest battle ship ever built by man can be floated in 14 feet of water; and it is only necessary to widen the Laurentian canals a few feet and the Dreadnought, properly lightened of her guns, can be brought up there to the Lakes. Through these locks, now 45 feet wide, one-half of all the war ressels of England can now be floated. If we must deal with improvements of this kind in the name of war, the time may soon come to demand this 14-foot channel to the sea, not so much in the name of commerce as for the future material safety of this nation.

I have before me the official documents which prove that this great Canadian waterway exists from the Lakes out to the sea. Canadian magazines at the present time are boasting of the fact that they are far in advance of us; that they have accomplished their object and have secured a 14-foot channel from these Lakes to the sea. At present they are arranging to deepen these channels so as to create a 20-foot waterway to the sea. We are at peace, of course, with all the world, but it has not been very long since-immediately after the launching of the Dreadnought-there was a ripple of unpleasantness, and it was intimated that in some way we had stolen the plans of the Dreadnought. But England did not object to giving the plans to Japan, and the evidence of the offensive and defensive alliance of the two great island nations is now apparent. We know now the Empire of Japan is completing the construction of its own Dreadnought on the plans of the great English battle ship.

It has been but a few days since there was another ripple of unpleasantness-it has not been satisfactorily explained yetdown here on the island of Jamaica. In time of peace it may still be well to prepare for war, and you can not do it betteryou can not protect Cleveland, with her million-dollar harbor and her magnificent public building, any better than by provid-ing this waterway, which will admit some of our own great war vessels to the Great Lakes.

Immediately after the opening of the last century we entered into an agreement with England which prevented us from keeping any war vessels upon the Great Lakes and which operated in the same way as to England, and both nations have kept that agreement until this time. But England has perfected an arrangement by which in thirty days' time she could put half her war vessels upon the Great Lakes, and we look on without even a murmur of surprise. Her 14-foot channel exists entirely within her own boundaries, far beyond the reach of our guns.

There is nothing new in this Lakes-to-the-Gulf project, I understood the chairman of the River and Harbor Committee to say yesterday that the idea was new and not yet sufficiently considered. It is not a matter which has been only recently agitated. In 1846 a great river convention met in the city of Memphis, Tenn. Six hundred and fifty delegates attended. John C. Calhoun presided over the deliberations of that body, and in 1846 that great convention declared itself to be in favor of a deep waterway from the Lakes to the Gulf. Since that time a deep waterway from the Lakes to the Gulf has been made the subject of at least five detailed reports by the engineer officers of the Government, and I can easily find every one of them. When the old Canadian voyageurs thought they owned the Illinois country and the Mississippi Valley, they owned the lillinois country and the Mississippi valley, they came nearly all the way by water down the Illinois and Mississippi rivers from the Great Lakes, and they dreamed of a waterway from the Lakes to the Gulf. But the scheme of a waterway from the Lakes to the Gulf dates farther back than any of these things. When the great Builder of worlds was building this particular world He furnished these Lakes with an outlet down through the Illinois and Mississippi rivers to the southern Gulf; and Chicago in her great undertaking has simply restored to the Lakes their ancient outlet; and now the waters of the greatest inland seas of the world to-day again mingle with the warmer waters of the Mexican Gulf.

The survey, commenced five years ago by order of Congress, from Lockport, the southern terminus of the drainage canal, to St. Louis has been completed. The engineers found that a 14foot channel was feasible as an engineering proposition all the way down, as far as they were authorized to go, to the city of Since that time great conventions have met and have indorsed this proposition, but some engineer officers of this Government in a few words disposed of everything that has been said upon this subject. When this matter was submitted to them by the River and Harbor Committee, they disposed of the whole subject in the following words:

The saving that would accrue to the country at large by the construc-tion of a 14-foot waterway is largely conjectural. In the opinion of the board such benefits would not be sufficient to warrant an expenditure by the General Government of $30,000,000.

The engineers of this Government have never advocated any project of real advantage to the nation. They presented an unbroken front when Eads proposed to build the jetties down at the mouth of the Mississippi River, and they said it could not be done, that a lateral canal was the thing to build. Upon his own responsibility he undertook that great work. He advised the improvement of the Southwest Pass, but they required him to improve another pass. That scheme proved successful, and now vessels drawing 30 feet of water can sail where vessels drawing 12 feet of water could not sail before. The Government is now also improving the Southwest Pass. When it was proposed to build the Monitor, the engineer officers of this Government opposed it and said it could not be done. They required a company to be formed, and the company was required to give a bond that the Monitor would be successful. required that the test be made in actual war under the guns of the enemy's vessels, and it was done, and the Monitor saved the country untold millions of dollars and revolutionized the art of modern naval war.

The Canadian government built the first canal around the Falls of St. Marys River in 1790. In 1839 the State of Michigan sent engineers, workmen, and contractors up to the St. Marys River country to commence the building of the present great St. Marys River Canal, and the engineer officers of the Government and the Army officers of the Government met them there in that northern country and said: "You can not build this canal. The demands of commerce are not great enough to require it, and it is not possible as an engineering feat." The development of the great northwest section of our country was delayed twenty years on account of the position taken by American engineers. To-day the engineers con-nected with the Naval Department present an unbroken front against submarines, and advocate the building of immense floating steel forts; but over in France they have adopted a differ-ent scheme, and they have proven that these little submarines, from unknown depths, unseen and in perfect safety, can launch terrible engines of war, armor-piercing projectiles, against the great battle ships we are building. You can not expect any great things to come from the Army engineers of this country.

It is a popular superstition that we graduate engineers up at West Point. I have looked into the statistics, and I propose to put my correspondence on this question in the Record, showing that in thirty years we have only graduated 178 engineers from West Point. The War Department itself regards every one of them as incompetent and prefers to employ in the great engineering works of this country the engineers who are graduates of our universities which have engineering departments. I propose not to read now, but to put in the Record, a letter from General Mackenzie himself which establishes this fact. The engineers employed on public works are every day leaving the employment of the Government to seek the higher wages and the better salaries paid them by railroads, and I will put in the RECORD some correspondence on that subject which establishes that fact. You can not expect any board of engineers to recommend any scheme that interferes with the rights of transcontinental railroads in this country; and when this board of engineers filed this opinion against this project there went up from every transcontinental railroad president's office in the United States a growl of joy.

The chairman of the River and Harbor Committee stated yesterday that every project in this bill was submitted, by virtue of the statute, to the board of review for rivers and harbors, to get its opinion as to the commercial necessity for the improvement. I am sorry the chairman of the committee is not here now, but I will put the statute on the subject in the RECORD. There is no such authority there. It authorizes the River and Harbor Committee to apply to this board for a finding of facts only after a project has been adopted and after an appropriation has been made in support thereof, but this particular project has never been adopted and no appropriation in

will insert here section 3 of the act approved June 13, 1902. The section referred to is as follows:

The section referred to is as follows:

That there shall be organized in the Office of the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, by detail from time to time from the Corps of Engineers, a board of five engineer officers, whose duties shall be fixed by the Chief of Engineers, and to whom shall be referred for consideration and recommendation, in addition to any other duties assigned, so far as in the opinion of the Chief of Engineers may be necessary, all reports upon examinations and surveys provided for by Congress, and all projects or changes in projects for works of river and harbor improvement heretofore or hereafter provided for. And the board shall submit to the Chief of Engineers recommendations as to the desirability of commencing or continuing any and all improvements upon which reports are required. And in the consideration of such works and projects the board shall have in view the amount and character of commerce existing or reasonably prospective which will be benefited by the improvement, and the relation of the ultimate cost of such work, both as to cost of construction and maintenance, to the public commercial interests involved, and the public necessity for the work, and propriety of its construction, continuance, or maintenance at the expense of the United States. And such consideration shall be given as time permits to such works as have here-tofore been provided for by Congress, the same as in the case of new works proposed. The board shall, when it considers the same necessary, and with the sanction and under orders from the Chief of Engineers, make, as a board or through its members, personal examinations of localities. And all facts, information, and arguments which are presented to the board for its consideration in connection with any matter referred to it by the Chief of Engineers shall be reduced to and submitted in writing, and made a part of the records of the Office of the Chief of Engineers shall be reduced to and submitted in writing, and made a part of the records of the Offic of continuing the same or upon any modifications thereof which may be deemed desirable.

The board shall have authority, with the approval of the Chief of Engineers, to rent quarters, if necessary, for the proper transaction of its business, and to employ such civil employees as may, in the opinion of the Chief of Engineers, be required for properly transacting the business assigned to it, and the necessary expenses of the board shall be paid from allotments made by the Chief of Engineers from any appropriations made by Congress for the work or works to which the duties of the board pertain.

I have just called attention to section 3 of the act approved June 13, 1902, the river and harbor act of that year. statement made by the chairman of this committee yester-day was that this survey or this project had been submitted by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to the Board of Engineers created by virtue of this act for a finding as to the commercial necessity of a 14-foot waterway from Lockport to St. Louis. There is no authority conferred by the section. I have read for this reference. The Chief of Engineers section I have read for this reference. The Chief of Engineers may require certain findings from this Board, but the Committee on Rivers and Harbors can only ask a report from the Board of Engineers upon "projects heretofore adopted by the Government or upon which appropriations have been made." This project has not yet been adopted and no appropriations have been made upon the same. The reference therefore was entirely without authority of law.

The section to which I have referred was again amended by the act of March 3, 1905—the river and harbor bill of that year and the provisions of the section were extended by the latter act so as to require the Board to examine and review surveys as well as projects provided for by acts and resolutions prior to the river and harbor act of June 13, 1902.

I submit that a great committee of this House has not the moral right to surrender its functions to a purely executive If this statute is to be recognized in the future, it will contribute more to militarism in this country than any other one thing I think of now. A board of Army engineers, if they are competent, ought to be called upon for an opinion as to the engineering features of a project and as to its feasibility, not its commercial desirability. The judgment of Army officers on a matter of that kind is entirely without value. Army officers in general, and the Army officers on this particular board, have had nothing to do with affairs—they have probably in all their lives never made a dollar in any commercial transaction. They have little sympathy with the commercial development of the The glorious days in the West, in their judgment, great West. were the days when Army officers, at the head of crushing squadrons of cavalry, were chasing Indians across the plains, who always ran away at their approach. They find little evidence of the present greatness of that section in the fields of wheat that ripen under the summer sun or in the millions of acres of corn that rustle in the winds of autumn.

If I could ever be induced to subscribe to a national policy of foreign spoliation and conquest, it would be for the reason that by embarking, on a larger scale, in exploitations of that character we might be able to get rid of the Army officers that infest this capital in such enormous numbers. I have never been able to find a good reason for keeping them here. Resplendent in gold lace, they contribute to the color scheme at White House receptions; this seems to be about the extent of their utility in the capital city.

The particular board who, in forty-four words, disposed of this great subject and who signed their names to this particularly erudite report is composed of the following Army officers: Col. D. W. Lockwood, who entered the Military Academy in Col. D. W. Lockwood, who entered the Military Academy in 1862 and who has been in the service since that time; Lieut. Col. R. L. Hoxie, who entered the Military Academy in 1864 and who has been in the service since that time; Maj. C. McD. Townsend, who entered the Military Academy in 1875; Maj. E. Evelith Winslow, who entered the Military Academy in 1885 and who had been on this board only a few months when he subscribed to this report; Capt. Charles W. Kutz, who entered the Military Academy in 1880. All of the above-named Army flows have been in the service of the United States since they officers have been in the service of the United States since they were boys. During the greater portion of that time they have received small salaries, and none of them except Colonel Lockreceived small salaries, and none of them except Colonel Lock-wood have ever received a larger salary than $3,000 per year, and if he is getting a salary larger than that now he has not been receiving it a very long time. They are as ignorant as infants of the ordinary business affairs of life. You can not expect them to recognize the great demands of present-day commerce and the necessity for the development of cheap transportation facilities. A statute which confers that authority upon them is wrong. An attempt to follow it will have a par-ticularly depressing influence upon the future commercial development of the country.

There is not even a great engineer on this board; a really great engineer would have been absorbed long ago by the railroad companies. West Point never has produced a great engineer or even a competent engineer, and that institution never will produce an engineer that can be called either great or competent. Fortunately for the country, however, a majority of the engineers engaged upon public works are graduates of our universities that are provided with engineering departments. The engineers provided by the Army are simply ornamental heads for our engineering equipment; the real work is done by heads for our engineering equipment, the real work is done by the civilian engineers. Army engineers do not do it, they simply get the credit for doing it. Civilian engineers in the employ of the Government are being drawn upon so largely by railroads that they hardly constitute an impartial body of men. There is present even with them a tendency to color purely engineering reports in the interest of railroad transportation companies. In support of the statements I have been making about engineers I will incorporate here in my speech my correspondence with the Departments upon this subject, and I will do so without fur-ther comment upon this phase of this question. The following is the correspondence referred to:

COMMITTEE ON LABOR,

Washington, D. C., December 21, 1996.

Hon. OSCAR P. Austin,

Chief Bureau of Statistics,

Department of Commerce and Labor, Washington, D. C. Department of Commerce and Labor, Washington, D. C.

Dear Sir: I am studying our military and naval schools at West Foint and Annapolis. At West Foint a number of graduates enter the engineering department of the service.

1. I am anxious to find out how many have entered the engineering department in the last twenty-five or thirty years; and
2. I also want to find out how long they remain in the Army.
3. About what proportion of them resign from the Army in order to accept employment from railroads or to accept employment in other branches of industry?

4. Do West Foint and Annapolis furnish the Government with any considerable proportion of the engineers now employed on Government works and employed in other capacities by the Government?

5. How many of these engineers come from the schools and colleges provided with engineering departments?

6. Is any considerable proportion of the young men educated in our schools lured away from Government employ by the larger salaries paid by railroads, etc.?

I wish you would advise me where I can find statistics on the above subjects. If you have anything that will assist me in the investigation, please oblige me by sending it to me.

Respectfully,

Henry T. Rainey.

Hon. Henry T. Rainey, M. C.,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Sir: I am in receipt of your letter of the 21st instant, asking for information as to how many of the graduates of West Point and Annapolis resign from the Army to accept employment from the railroads or other branches of industry; also for information as to such graduates along other lines.

In response, I have to inform you that this Bureau has no information on this subject. It is believed that the records of the War and Navy Departments can afford you the best information in regard to the matter. I have therefore referred your letter to the chief clerk of the War Department, with the request that he will furnish you such information as he can, and forward the letter to the Navy Department for such data as it can supply. It might be well for you to take the matter up directly with those Departments.

Very truly, yours,

O. P. Austin, Chief of Bureau.

you can, and forward the letter to the Navy Department for reply with respect to graduates from the Naval Academy. Mr. Rainey has been informed of this reference.

Hon. Henry T. Rainey,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Sir: I have the honor to inform you that your letter of the 27th instant to the Secretary of War, inclosing a copy of your letter of the 21st instant to the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics regarding graduates of the United States Military and Naval academies, has been referred to this office. Your former letter, which was referred by the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics to the War Department was also referred to this office.

The information you desire, so far as it relates to the graduates of the United States Military Academy, is not contained in any publication, but the superintendent of the Military Academy was called upon to furnish such information as the records of the acadmey afford on the subject, and his reply, giving the number of graduates who were promoted in the Engineer Corps or subsequently transferred thereto, since 1870, has been received and referred to the Chief of Engineers for such further information in the line of your inquiry as he may be able to furnish. When his reply shall have been received all the information obtained will be promptly transmitted to you.

Respecting the graduates of the Naval Academy, it is suggested that you communicate directly with the Navy Department instead of awaiting reference of your original letter to that Department after it shall have been received back from the Chief of Engineers.

Very respectfully,

F. C. Ainsworth,

The Military Secretary.

Sir: I have the honor, by direction of the Secretary of War, to return herewith your letter of the 21st ultimo to the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, requesting certain information regarding graduates of the United States Military and Naval academies and engineers employed on public works, and to invite your attention to the reports of the superintendent of the Military Academy and of the Chief of Engineers, indorsed on your letter, giving all available information on the subjects of your inquiry.

Very respectfully,

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, January 2, 1907.

Washington, January 2, 1907.

1. Respectfully returned to The Military Secretary.
2. Questions one, two, and three having been covered by the Superintendent of the United States Military Academy, leaves only four, five, and six to be answered.

3. As to question four, it may be said that including all the Departments of the Government which conduct "public works" or employ engineers in "other capacities," the engineer officers who are graduates of the Military Academy form but an insignificant proportion, numerically, of the total number of engineers who serve the United States.

4. As to question five, there are no data on the records of this office sufficiently complete to permit a definite reply. So far as the Engineer Department is concerned, a large number of the civil engineers employed are graduates of engineering colleges, and preference is given to such graduates in all cases.

5. As to question six, it can be said that a number of valuable civilian assistant engineers have left the service of the Corps of Engineers during the past few years to engage in more lucrative private practice or to accept higher salaries from other parties.

A. Mackenzie,

A. MACKENZIE,
Brigadier-General, Chief of Engineers, U. S. Army.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF NAVIGATION,

Washington, D. C., January 19, 1907.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 27th ultimo, I have the honor to advise you that there is no engineer corps in the United States Navy at the present time. The course of instruction prescribed at the Naval Academy qualifies every graduate of that institution for the performance of such engineering duties as required in the Navy, and no graduates of any school or college other than the Naval Academy and the officers who rise from the warrant officers' grades to the line of the Navy through competitive examination are employed in such capacity. A number of officers of the line have resigned in recent years in order to accept more remunerative positions in civil life, but the Bureau has no statistics from which to compile information as to the salaries paid or character of the work offered.

There is a corps of civil engineers in the Navy, in which there are thirty-three commissioned officers. Five of these officers are graduates of the Naval Academy. One of these five received a degree in civil engineering from an engineering school, and the other four are pursuing a special course of instruction at an engineering school.

The Department has no information as to the number of engineers employed on public works who are graduates of colleges that have engineering departments.

Very respectfully,

W. P. POTTER,

Acting Chief of Bureau.

W. P. POTTER, Acting Chief of Bureau.

Hon. Henry T. Rainey, M. C., House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

As opposed to the opinion of this Board of Engineers I propose to the opinion of this Board of Engineers 1 propose to insert in the Record at this point in my speech the remarks of Hon. Theodore P. Shonts, chairman of the Isthmian Canal Commission, before the Chicago Commercial Club, January 26, 1907; and I also put in the Record here the resolutions recently adopted by the Illinois Society of Engineers and Surveyers, which are embodied in a letter addressed to the Speaker and to the Members of this House and bearing date the 23d day of January, 1907.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Extract from address of Hon. Theodore P. Shonts.]

[Extract from address of Hon. Theodore P. Shonts.]

If conditions were to remain permanently as they are to-day, there might be a doubt as to the wisdom of this expenditure [for the canal]; but when we look around and see the rapidly increasing population and resulting density of traffic in our own country, when we observe that our vast transportation facilities, which made possible our country's wonderful expansion and form the underlying basis of our prosperity, are simply swamped with the traffic which they are called upon to handle, and when we contemplate the enormous amount of money that must be raised to adequately provide facilities for taking care of the increased volume of business, we are compelled to conclude that the superfluous population of the earth will soon be forced into other channels than the United States, and is not unlikely to move into the vast fertile plains and rich regions of our South American neighbors.

NEED WIDER MARKETS.

Need wider Markets.

Notwithstanding our phenomenal growth in population, our capacity to produce in both field and factory has more than kept pace with our growth in numbers. If our prosperity is to continue, we must have wide markets for our goods. What better fields for exploitation exist than the territory of our next-door neighbors in Central and South America? But while it is necessary to have the markets in which to sell our goods, it is equally necessary to have the facilities with which to transport them. I mean by this that the volume of our export trade to dray is seriously hampered by the overtaxed condition of our railways, especially at terminal points; in fact, it is a serious question whether it has not reached its limit under present conditions. Many of the important railway systems in their desire to provide more adequate accommodations are going so far in their efforts to raise money for this purpose as to well-nigh imperii their credit.

Port terminals are already so scarce and valuable as to render adequate relief in that direction improbable, in fact, impossible, at any reasonable cost. It is therefore suggested that there be created a vast interior harbor reaching from Chicago to the Gulf.

TERMINAL OPPORTUNITIES.

The beneficial effects of such a harbor are many and obvious. In the first place, it would furnish opportunities for the creation of terminal facilities along its entire length. In the second place, it would build up and develop the entire Mississippi Valley by giving it the advantages of terminal ports brought close to its doors. In the third place, and this has a most direct bearing on our canal proposition, it would give the people of our great Middle West, with their geographical proximity and these superior transportation facilities, a distinct advantage over the rest of the country in commanding the South American trade.

PEORIA, ILL., January 23, 1907.

Hon. Joseph G. Cannon,
Speaker of the House of Representatives,
and Members of Congress from Illinois, Washington, D. C.

Hon. Joseph G. Cannon,

Speaker of the House of Representatives,
and Members of Congress from Illinois, Washington, D. C.

Dear Sirs: We, the undersigned members of the Illinois Society of Engineers and Surveyors, in annual session assembled, do hereby address the following memorial to you in expression of our deep conviction of the feasibility and practicability and the commercial utility (in comparison to its probable cost) of the proposed improvement of the Illinois River into a commercial waterway having a channel of not less than 14 feet in depth as a connection between the already nearly completed sanitary and ship canal leading from Chicago to Joliet with the Mississippi River at or near St. Louis.

We are fully aware that this subject is at the present time before the House of Representatives for consideration, and we are reliably, though not officially, informed that the two boards, one of survey and one of investigation, of the United States Government have investigated by survey and inquiry into the question of the feasibility and commercial utility of this project and have made their reports to Congress. That the report of the first board of survey unqualifiedly compares. That the second boact whity of the plan with an estimate of its cost. That the second boact whity of the plan with an estimate of its cost. That the second boact with the plan with an estimate of its cost of the survey and the s dered by this board, if it had been applied to the construction of the canals and locks at the Sault Ste. Marie, based upon statistics covering only the traffic known at that time over the proposed route, would have prevented forever the construction of that most wonderful highway of commerce, and that the same argument would have prevented private enterprise from ever construction any of the great transcontinental railroads and would doubtless prevail against the construction of the Panama Canal and would never have permitted England to have expended millions of dollars on the Suez Canal.

Finally that nothing but the experience of the future and analogy with above cases can absolutely prove what we fully believe to be the fact, namely, that the completion of a 14-foot channel to connect the Lakes at Chicago with the Mississippi River at St. Louis will be not only a justifiable expenditure for the United States from the local standpoint of the State of Illinois, but from the standpoint of the future best welfare of the nation.

Respectfully submitted.

I do not want to make the charge, so often made with reference to river and harbor bills, that this bill is simply another pork barrel." My interest in waterways is too great to permit me to do or to say anything that might contribute in the least toward discouraging future large river and harbor appropriatoward discouraging future large river and harbor appropria-tions. I notice, however, that "Raccoon Creek" is quite liber-ally provided for in this bill. I do not know where "Raccoon Creek" is; I have never heard of it before. It may be an im-portant commercial stream. If it is, I congratulate the commit-tee upon discovering it. But while I congratulate them in this particular, I am unable to understand why a committee that is able to discover "Raccoon Creek" at the same time almost forgot that the Mississippi River extends in its southward course from St. Louis to Cairo. I do not know who represents the Congres-St. Louis to Cairo. I do not know who represents the Congressional district in which "Raccoon Creek" is located; but I undertake to say that whoever does represent this particular district here will be found voting for this bill just as it is and will be found opposing any amendment we may offer. I have no doubt that all the people in that section, from the headwaters of "Raccoon Creek" all the way down along its majestic course to the sea, will be particularly grateful to the man who has succeeded in getting in the bill this appropriation, and, of course, they ought to feel that way. "Contentnia Creek" is also provided for in this bill, and somewhere there is some Member of Congress who will be "content" with that and who will oppose all amendments to this bill.

I do not know where "Blackwater Creek" is located nor where "Nomini Creek" can be found; and I notice also that "Mantua Creek," "Wappinger Creek," and "Browns Creek" are all liberally provided for in this bill. The fact that I have never heard of any of these streams is due, of course, to my lack of knowledge of the geography of the country. They may be important streams; I do not say they are not. If they are important I congratulate the committee upon their discovery. I know, however, where the Chicago Ship Canal is, and the Illinois River, and the Mississippi River, and every man, woman, and child in this country knows where these great waterways I can not understand how the same committee which is able to find the creeks to which I have called attention is unable to discover any commercial importance in the waterways to which I have called attention. The bill has been carefully drawn; its passage unamended I am afraid is assured. The "pork barrel" features are not entirely absent.

The thing to be most condemned, however, about this measure is the general policy of the bill, which, if continued, will compel the entire country to pay tribute to the steel trust and its allied organizations. It is this feature of the bill which requires the most serious consideration. It is this apparent policy of waterway improvement in the interior of the country that ought most to arouse the public conscience. There is no way of combating this policy or its tendencies, except by commencing in the near future the construction of this great water highway from the Lakes to the sea. I desire to discuss briefly this feature of the bill

Not long ago, fifteen years ago or so, we undertook the construction of the Hennepin Canal. I have indicated it there on that large map. The reason for undertaking the construction of that canal was to provide a short and cheap waterway, 7 feet in depth, from the twin cities of the north and from the great Northwest to Chicago and the Lakes. That waterway is nearing completion. It will be ready for operation during the coming summer, as I am advised. But when they undertook the construction of the Hennepin Canal we had a waterway in Illinois leading from La Salle, the head of navigation on the Illinois River, up to Lake Michigan, nearly a bundred miles—the old Illinois and Michigan Canal.

The commencement and completion of this waterway—I refer to the Hennepin Canal—was made possible by the fact that it only completed the link between the great Northwest and Lake Michigan. Since that time the Illinois and Michigan Canal has The railroads commenced their fight against ceased to exist. waterways in Illinois over thirty-six years ago, and in the State constitution adopted at that time it was provided that the State could not make any appropriations for the support of canals. But the years passed, and appropriations were made every year until last year, and the Illinois and Michigan Canal was kept in operation. Last year from some direction, no man knew where, there came an opposition to further appropriations. Injunction proceedings were brought; the law was plain, the courts could do nothing else, they were reluctantly compelled to enforce this railroad provision of the constitution.

There is now no money to maintain the decaying locks of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, and the approaching season will see the last of that great waterway. The millions expended on the Hennepin Canal are absolutely wasted unless there is a canal from La Salle, the head of navigation on the Illinois River, up to Lake Michigan.

But a singular thing happened. At the very time they com-menced out in Illinois to fight the Illinois and Michigan Canal in the courts; over there 800 miles away they commenced a move-ment for the Lake Erie and Ohio River Canal. During the During the closing hours of the last session there slipped through this body a most extraordinary piece of legislation, a bill authorizing the ironmasters of Pittsburg to build a canal from a point near Cleveland, on the Lakes, down to Pittsburg, having a depth of not less than 12 feet.

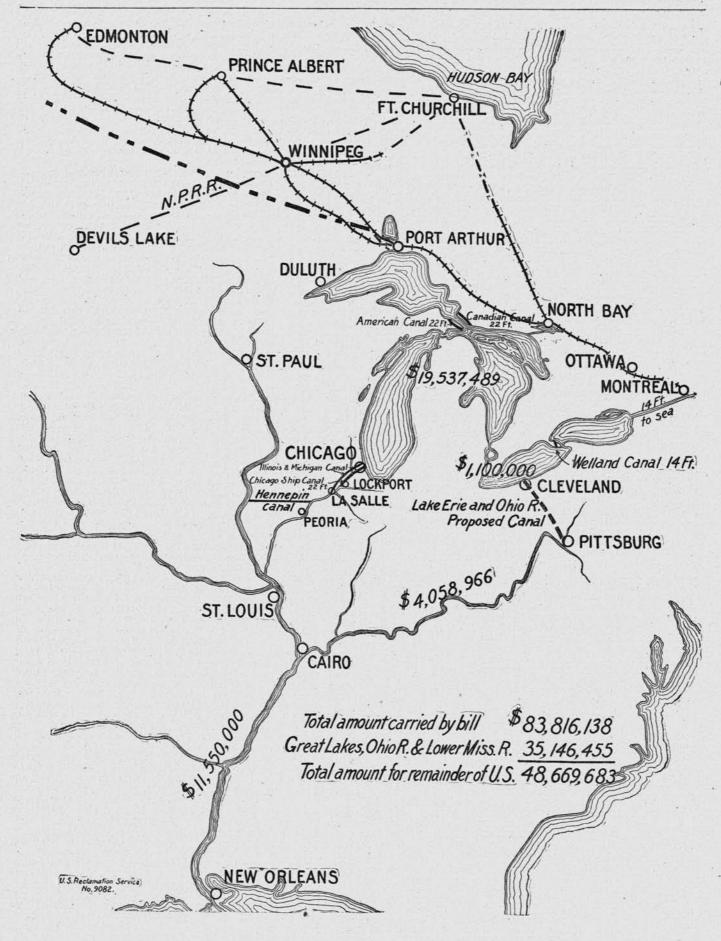

Now, bearing in mind these two facts, that from some source, no man knows where, came the legal proceedings which resulted in closing the waterway in Illinois connecting the Lakes with the river—the party appearing as complainant in that pro-ceeding had not the slightest interest in the subject-matter of that suit—and that at the same time these millionaires of Cleveland and Pittsburg got through Congress this bill, I want you to look at this map I have caused to be displayed here.

The appropriations for the Great Lakes, added together, amount to something over $19,000,000. The appropriation for the 900 miles of the Ohio River between Pittsburg and Cairo amounts to over $4,000,000. The appropriations for the lower Mississippi River amount to over $11,000,000. The policy of a bill like this means this and nothing else: It means the development of an immense commerce on these, to us, landlocked lakes; it means the development of immense commercial possibilities along the Ohio and lower Mississippi rivers, and it means more than this-if the commerce of the Ohio River and lower Mississippi and the commerce of the Great Lakes is to be exchanged, it must be done through this canal, upon which they are authorized to issue $800,000,000 worth of stocks and bonds ten times the sum required to build it. It must go through this canal; and upon it, according to this act, and I have it before me, the ironmasters of Pittsburg may levy any kind of toll they please.

In the olden days robber barons and other dignitaries established their castles along the Rhine and along the other commex-cial waterways of Europe and enforced their right to demand toll of every vessel that passed their fortresses loaded with mer-chandise. If this policy is to continue, we are building up here in this country a tremendous commerce which can exist only by paying tolls to these modern robber barons—the ironmasters of Pittsburg-and in no other way.

The Cape May project illustrates further the influences which seem to have been paramount in the preparation of this bill. Over a million dollars is appropriated for the construction of a harbor for Cold Springs Inlet. The Cape May Realty

[Note.—The Lake Eric and Ohio River Canal, under the act of Congress, may start on Lake Eric at any point between the mouth of Grand River, 28 miles east of Cleveland, and the Pennsylvania and Ohio State line, and not at Cleveland, as apparently shown on this map. It has its southern terminus on the Ohio River near Pittsburg.]

Company will profit enormously by this large expenditure, and the Government is presenting the millionaires of Pittsburg with a splendid harbor of refuge for their private pleasure yachts. I have no time to discuss this matter, but it is interesting to note that the millionaires of Pittsburg own the stock in the Cape May Realty Company.

There is only one way by which this depressing effect upon

There is only one way by which this depressing effect upon the commerce of the country can now be avoided, and that is to establish here from Chicago all the way down to the Gulf the waterway the Mississippi Valley is demanding.

When the Panama Canal is completed, it will be another mouth for the Mississippi River, and that great river will empty not only into the southern Gulf and the Atlantic Ocean, but will have this connection with the Pacific Ocean and with all the countries that touch upon all the seas of all the world.

No man yields in admiration or respect more than I do to the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. There is no abler man in public life than this scholarly gentleman. The announcement has been made in the daily papers that he proposes to abandon his position at the head of the River and Harbor Committee. If this is true, I congratulate him, and I also congratulate the country.

A position at the head of some other and more important committee will yield to the distinguished gentleman greater opportunities, and the country might then get the benefit to a still larger degree of his great ability. If I were a Republican, I would second the motion of my friend the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Clark]. I would be in favor of booming the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Burton] for the Republican nomination for President of the United States, and I would be for him, too, unless my own State should present a candidate, as I understand it will. In that event, if I were a Republican, as a matter of State pride and loyalty, I would have to be for him. But I want to say to both of these gentlemen, and I say it in a spirit of kindly warning, particularly to the gentleman from Illinois, who presides with such ability over the deliberations of the lower House of the Congress, that no man can ever be elected to the high office of President of the United States who is opposed to this great waterway. There is another gentleman in this country who will lead, two years from now, the Democratic party to battle and to victory. He is a man who is able to see the light upon the mountain tops, and long ago he placed himself on record in favor of this great enterprise. [Applause.]

We are ready to indorse the demands of Boston, we are in favor of improving the harbor of New York, and we think Philadelphia ought to have her 35-foot channel to the sea. We have for a century contributed to the splendid prosperity of these great cities and we are willing to continue to do so. But the time has come when we ought to demand something for ourselves. Beyond the boundaries of these imperial States which touch the Atlantic Ocean lies the great West, with its broad, fertile acres, its streams running bank full, its populous cities, its splendid expanse of forest and plain, its majestic rivers flowing down to the sea. What benefits you is of advantage also to us. What contributes to our progress promotes also your material prosperity. You have an easy and cheap access to the ocean highways of the world. We ask you to clasp hands with us across these mountain ranges and aid us in obtaining this all-important commercial waterway, and the wealth and progress and happiness which come to us by reason of it will benefit equally all sections of this the greatest of the nations. [Long-continued applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record and to incorporate in them certain letters and documents to which I have referred.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, the river and harbor bill now before the House for consideration carries the largest appropriation and authorization of any bill of its kind in the history of the country, and in my opinion it is the most economical river and harbor bill that was ever reported to the House. I say it is the most economical because, in my judgment, the people of the country will receive more substantial and permanent advantage for the money it appropriates than they have received from the appropriation of any like sum at any time heretofore. I base these commendations of the pending bill upon the wise business policy which it embodies.

The bill provides for the appropriation of $35,000,000, in round numbers, and it authorizes the Secretary of War to enter into contracts for the completion of improvements that have been decided upon to the amount of about $48,000,000 in addition.

It has been the custom in years past for Congress to enact a river and harbor bill only once in two years, and measured by that custom the appropriation carried by this bill will cover a period of two years, and the contracts authorized by the Secretary of War will run until the several improvements contemplated by the measure shall have been completed. Appropriations will be made from time to time in the future to pay the contract obligations as they mature, and these authorizations may run over a period of six, eight, or possibly ten years; so while the bill seems to create a liability upon the Government for $83,000,000, $35,000,000 are to be expended in the next two years and the balance is to be paid upon contracts as the contract work progresses, and the appropriations will be spread out over several years to come.

I desire to emphasize the business value of that feature of the bill which authorizes contracts for the completion of river and harbor improvements that have been decided upon. Everyone knows that when an improvement is to be made it can be made at much greater advantage and much less expense if a contract can be let at the outset for its completion. The firm or company that takes the contract may make calculation for the entire undertaking and can prosecute it systematically and in a businesslike manner to the end. The practice heretofore has been to determine upon and authorize an improvement that may cost a number of million dollars in the aggregate and that may take five or six or eight years for its completion, and to appropriate such a sum of money as may be reasonably expended within the first year or two without authorizing the Secretary of War to make a contract for the entire work at the outset. policy the Secretary of War, who is charged with the expenditure of all river and harbor appropriations, would authorize a contract to the extent of the first appropriation, and the contractor would enter upon the work according to the plans adopted by the War Department and carry out his contract to the extent of the available money. The next Congress would appropriate another sum, say, a hundred or two hundred thousand dollars, and a new contract would be entered into to take up the work where the first contractor left off and continue it as far as that appropriation would justify; and then another Congress would make still another appropriation of a hundred or two hundred thousand dollars, possibly, and still a third contract would be let to begin the work where the second contractor left off and carry it along as far as the available appropriation would permit, and thus on to the end, so that a particular improvement involving the carrying out of one definite project would be cut up into piecemeal and possibly be let to three or four different contractors.

After one contract had been carried out the work that had been done might deteriorate by the wind and the waves, and the succeeding contractor would be required to spend a considerable part of the fund then available in restoring the work done by his predecessor. I know of several harbors that have been constructed upon that plan, and it is the most extravagant and wasteful policy conceivable. The Government can save from 25 to 50 per cent in the cost of many river and harbor improvements by the plan embodied in the pending bill—that of authorizing the Secretary of War to contract with a responsible firm for the completion of the work at the beginning. This feature of the bill can not be too strongly emphasized nor too highly commended, and the country doubtless will realize its obligation to the able members of the River and Harbor Committee for putting its public work upon a business policy that is so manifestly wise and economical.

If the bill contained no authorizations the contingent liability, against the Government would have been as much greater as would be the increase of cost of doing the work by the old piecemeal method, for having decided upon specific improvements and made appropriations for their partial construction, the Government would, of course, make further appropriations from time to time for the completion of the improvements, so the unusual magnitude of the bill is apparent only and not real. There is a habit of random criticism of river and harbor bills by a portion of the public press, based, perhaps, upon an undefined impression that much public money is appropriated for improvements that have no commercial value. It may be that in years past this class of bills were open to that kind of criticism, but for the last ten years every appropriation for river and harbor improvement has been rigidly scrutinized and they have all been found wise and judicious. No expenditure of public money has yielded a greater return in advancing the prosperity of all parts of the country, and the pending bill has been prepared with great care and discrimination.

The large appropriation and authorization carried by the pending bill are justified by the growing importance of the transportation problem. Never in the history of this Government has transportation been so vitally connected with production and prosperity as it is at the present time. Railroad lines which are the chief reliance of the great producing interior, have insufficient facilities for the accommodation of the stupendous volume of production, and the uncertainty of transportation and the high rates required in many instances very seriously embarrass enterprise. Transportation and the exchange of com-modities are as vital to the problem of production as the creation of the commodities themselves. An article is of no value where it has no means of reaching the consumer. There is a cry throughout the length and breadth of the country of a lack of railroad cars to transport the great volume of produce and manufactures, and any expenditure that tends to increase the facilities for transportation and to reduce freight rates must give a great stimulus to manufacture and all other lines of production throughout the country.

The farmers are peculiarly interested in the improvement of harbors and waterways. As a rule the prices of farm products depend upon foreign prices, and the cost of transportation from the farm to the foreign market is a vital question. During the last thirty years facilities for transportation have so increased and freight rates have been so reduced that notwithstanding there has been a general decline throughout the world in the price of food products, yet the price of products on the farm in the Mississippi Valley have gradually increased. The increase of facilities for transportation and the reduction of the cost of sending meats and grains from the farms to the European markets have more than offset the general decline in the world's markets of the prices of foodstuffs. Under existing conditions almost every unnecessary element of expense in the transportation of wheat from Dakota wheat fields to the markets in Liverpool has been eliminated, and the farm price is closer the Liverpool price to-day than it ever was in the history of the Government. This condition illustrates the great importance of still further improving facilities for transportation in the hope of still further reducing the freight rates from the farm to the

Our volume of production has come to be so tremendous that the present railroad facilities are not sufficient to accommodate it all without great delay and embarrassment. Ocean transportation rates have declined very materially during the last thirty years. This decline has been brought about in numerous ways, among others the increase of the capacity of the great ocean freighters. Many of the boats now engaged regularly in the foreign trade draw 35 feet of water, and it has become necessary to deepen the harbors at all the principal ports of the United States on both the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, Transportation on the Great Lakes has revolutionized during the last twenty years. Long ago boats of one and two thousand tons capacity were doing the principal part of the business, but to-day there are great iron steamers carrying 10,000 tons and upward of freight, and this change requires a deepening of harbors and greater improvements of existing waterways to accommodate the large modern ships.

A number of years ago the German Empire began to realize the importance of the construction of canals and waterways from the coast to the interior, and to-day the great waterways leading into the interior of Germany are the chief means of transportation of the products of the farm and factory to foreign countries. Hundreds of millions of dollars have been expended by that Government for the construction and improvement of internal waterways, and the growing prosperity of the farmers and manufacturers of Germany is the highest encomium that can be passed upon its transportation policy. expend over a hundred million dollars a year in building up and maintaining a navy, but the expenditure does not exceed $25. 000,000 a year for the improvement of rivers and harbors. feel a just pride in our splendid Navy, and look upon it as the chief source of national defense and the protection of our commercial rights upon the high seas. It is of equal importance that we employ every reasonable means at our command to increase the facilities for transportation, and thereby multiply our commerce not only at home, but abroad, in order that there may be a valuable ocean commerce for the Navy to guard and protect.

The State of New York is expending over a hundred million dollars for the improvement of the Erie Canal with a view of connecting the Great Lakes with the ocean. This vast sum is to be levied upon the taxable property of that one State alone. The people of the Empire State realize the vast importance of providing for water transportation wherever it is practicable.

The people in the Mississippi Valley have a peculiar interest in the project, that is now so generally discussed, of establishing a ship canal from the Great Lakes to the Mississippi River and to the Gulf of Mexico, and the people of the district I have the honor to represent are especially alive to the importance of this great undertaking. Nothing would so stimulate manufactures in and about the city of Chicago as this great addition to the means of transportation and that important outlet not only to the Southern States, but to the markets of the world. With a ship canal from Lake Michigan to the Gulf of Mexico all products throughout the Mississippi Valley, and particularly within a radius of 200 miles of the city of Chicago, would materially increase in value. Ships would be loaded with cargo at the city of Chicago and carried by water transportation to all the markets of the world. It would open up the markets of the North to the people in the Southern States. It would be a great impetus to interior manufacture. Boats laden with cargo from the city of Chicago would distribute products along the lower Mississippi River and at New Orleans, and would return with products of the Southern States, particularly lumber, and lumber is an item of great importance to the people throughout the entire Mississippi Valley. The white-pine forests of Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota have become exhausted, and the great hard-wood forests of Ohio and Indiana have long ceased to yield lumber for the country's markets. The result is that manufacturers and builders are now required to import lumber from the Southern States or the Pacific coast, and the cost of transportation is so great under existing conditions as to make the price of lumber so high that it greatly retards building and manufactures. With a deep waterway from Chicago into the Southern States the effect would necessarily be to materially reduce the cost of transportation of lumber from Tennessee, Mississippi, and Louisiana, and the reduction in price through-out the entire Mississippi Valley would be substantial, and every farmer and every manufacturer would be direct beneficiaries.

That great waterway would still further decrease the difference between the farm prices of grain and meats and Liverpool prices, and the effect would be to substantially increase the value of every farm that would be touched by the influence of the improvement.

Its effect would be not only to increase facilities for transportation and to open up the Middle West directly to the world's markets by water intercourse, but to reduce and regulate railroad freight rates throughout the country, and it would immensely stimulate the construction of factories in the Middle

A few days ago I received a letter upon this subject from Edward Rumely, of Laporte, Ind., written on behalf of the M. Rumely Company, an old, substantial, and prosperous manufacturing establishment at that place, an establishment that is engaged in the manufacture of traction engines, separators, cornshellers, and clover hullers. That institution sells its products in all the States of the Union and in foreign countries, and it appreciates the importance of improvements that will increase transportation advantages. Competition at home and abroad is becoming more exacting every decade, and the factories in the Middle West must increase their advantages or they can not hope to compete in the markets of the world. I send the letter to the Clerk's desk to have it read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hon. E. D. CRUMPACKER, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIE: You know that a bill is now pending before Congress urging an annual appropriation of not less than fifty millions for the improvement of our rivers. We wish to call your attention to this matter, presenting our view of the same, and to ask, in case you agree with us in thinking that this appropriation would be to the interest of the majority of your constituents, to do all in your power for the passage of this bill.

of this bill.

Manufacturers everywhere, and especially we, have suffered greatly by the incapacity of railways to take care of traffic. At times some departments of our factory have been greatly hampered by lack of raw materials. Then in shipping our goods we have great difficulty in getting them to destination. That is not all. Everywhere over the country farmers are unable to pay their notes because the crops are still in the fields; they can not sell them, or have been obliged to dispose of them at a great sacrifice. We feel that something must be done. The needs for transportation are growing each year with the population, but in addition to that each individual to-day requires more transportation than he would have if he had lived five, ten, or twenty years ago.

portation than he would have if he had lived five, ten, or twenty years ago.

The opening of the Mississippi River so as to secure water freight from Chicago down will be of great importance to the manufacturers of this district. As soon as the Panama Canal is completed it will enable us to enter South American markets to the best advantage. Land freight to New York and thence down is a roundabout and expensive way of moving our goods. The presence of a waterway would also help us in moving goods from this part of the country to the Southern and Southwestern States. In fact, the time has come when it is almost imperative for the Central States grouped about Lake Michigan to find a cheaper and readier transportation if they wish to hold their present rank as manufacturing centers.

The timber of this district has been cut and lumber must be moved long distances, some of it that we use as much as 2,000 miles. The same is true of other raw materials. If this extra expense becomes too heavy it will favor other manufacturers located nearer the source of supplies and make successful competition almost impossible.

The interests of the employees are identified with those of the manufacturers in this matter.

We trust that you will agree with us in thinking the passage of this bill to the best interest of the majority of your constituents in this district, and that you will be able to use your influence in its favor.

Very truly, yours,

M. RUMELY Co., By EDWARD RUMELY, Treasurer.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I commend the wise suggestions contained in that letter to every Member of the House. They are the result of years of business experience on the part of one of the most successful manufacturing establishments in the State of Indiana.

I do not know whether the engineering situation is such that Congress would be justified in making a large appropriation for this enterprise at this time, but I do know that the people of the Mississippi Valley with practical unanimity will insist in the near future that the Government provide means for the establishment of that great waterway. No expenditure of an equal amount of money would add more to the wealth and the taxable resources of the country, and in a single decade the Government would receive in the way of revenues, as a result of the incidental increase of production, many times more than the cost of the undertaking. The problem of handling the waters of the Mississippi River below St. Louis is one that belongs to science, and one about which there is considerable controversy, but I sincerely hope that a practical way will soon be discovered to put the improvement in the course of early completion.

Mr. MADDEN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. How much time does the gentleman from Illinois desire?

Mr. MADDEN. About forty-five minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the river and harbor bill before the House provides for an expenditure of about $84,000,000. Illinois contains about one-fourteenth of the population of the United States and it is receiving in this bill the one hundred and sixty-eighth part of the amount appropriated. The city of Peoria, in Illinois, alone pays over $30,000,000 annually into the public Treasury as internal-revenue tax. Chicago has paid $50,000,000 toward the construction of the waterway which we have just been discussing. The State of Illinois offers this waterway, which requires no expenditure for maintenance, free of charge to the Federal Government. There can be no excuse for not accepting it. All we ask in return is that the Federal Government extend this great work down to the Mississippi River.

Much of the amount recommended by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors is calculated to develop and improve the commerce of the nation. There are many projects recommended which do not appeal to me as representing that economy of expenditure which should be exercised in the improvement of our waterways, and yet it would perhaps be unjust to say that any recommendation made by the committee is not intended to meet the ever-increasing demand for added facilities through which it may be hoped to cheapen the movement of freight.

It should be the policy of the Government to enter upon and prosecute systematically the improvement of the interior waterways of the country, so that the freight of the country might be moved at the lowest possible cost.

No expenditure of the people's money will, in my judgment, produce such telling results as that which may be used in the wise development of the country's interior waterways. It is no longer doubted by anyone that we have neglected this feature of the country's development, until to-day we are unable to meet the ever-increasing demands for the movement of the commerce of the nation.

The railroads in the early history of the country met every need of the people. They enabled the people to settle in the remotest places of the country. They advanced civilization and cultivation and increased commerce. Through their civilizing influence the nation has prospered until to-day it stands at the head of the nations of the earth. The time has come when the people in their own interests must create facilities by expenditures from the National Treasury which can not be controlled by combinations of capital and which will in themselves regulate the prices for the movement of commodities as well as afford the necessary means of transporting the products of the people's labor, so that all may be afforded an equal opportunity to compete in an open, free, and fair field.

The people of the Central West are unanimous in the opinion that the construction of a waterway from the Lakes to the Gulf should be undertaken, and it was their hope that an appropriation to begin the work would be recommended in the present bill. That they will be disappointed at the failure of the Rivers and Harbors Committee to make such a recommendation there is no doubt. That such a waterway would be of inestimable value to the nation no one will deny. That Congress intended some time in the future that such a waterway should be constructed is apparent; or it would not have ordered the expenditure of $200,000 for a survey to ascertain the feasibility of such a project. That it is feasible admits of no argument. The Engineer Corps of the War Department, under whose direction the survey was made, reports that it is, and that such a waterway 14 feet deep from the end of the Sanitary District Drainage Canal, near Lockport, Ill., to St. Louis can be constructed at a cost of $31,000,000.

The city of Chicago has already created the nucleus of this great improvement, having constructed 40 miles of channel 100 feet wide, 36 feet deep, and containing 28 feet of water, at the expenditure by the citizens of Chicago alone of $50,000,000, a larger sum than was ever expended by any municipality on earth for any similar purpose.

It is now proposed to turn this over to the Federal Government free of cost on condition that it extend this ship canal through the Desplaines Valley and Illinois River to St. Louis.

The necessary increase in the transportation facilities of the country and the future prosperity of the States bordering on the Mississippi Valley depend in a large measure upon this undertaking. Further than this, the whole country is clamoring for rate regulation, and no question before our people at this time is demanding greater attention.

By opening up this great natural highway of transportation, the congestion of our railways would be relieved and the question of rate regulation in the Mississippi Valley would at once and forever be settled.

The area to be directly benefited by this improvement contains over 39,000,000 of inhabitants, or nearly one-half of our entire population. It produces over three-fourths of the food products of the country. The rapid increase in its commerce and population makes it imperative that the needed relief be promptly afforded them.

This proposed waterway is in no sense a local or even a sectional question. All thoughtful men know that any great enterprise that tends to benefit any portion of our country must necessarily benefit the whole country. The manufacturers of the East are as deeply interested in the completion of this great waterway as are the merchants, the shippers, the manufacturers, and the farmers of the West.

The Committee on Rivers and Harbors have considered it wise to refrain from recommending an appropriation for this project at this time for the reason that no survey has yet been made of that portion of the project leading from St. Louis to New Orleans by way of the Mississippi River, and it is their contention that no outlay should be made until the fullest investigation of the feasibility of the plan from beginning to end shall be demonstrated; and the committee further suggests that, although the engineers of the War Department recommended the feasibility of the project between Chicago and St. Louis, another commission, selected at the instance of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, advises that it is not of sufficient commercial value to warrant the expenditure; and I am led to the conclusion from statements made by the chairman of the committee that the action of the committee is largely based upon the report of the Commission, to the effect that the expenditure would not be warranted by the tonnage which might be originated along the line of the proposed waterway.

I have the highest respect for the engineering ability of the gentlemen composing the Commission—on engineering questions; but who is the member of the Commission who has had sufficient commercial experience to warrant him in deciding a great commercial question? If the opinion of this Commission is of such vast importance commercially, one must wonder why it is that they have not been called into the commercial life of the nation, where men of genius and experience are in great demand in the settlement of questions involving large expenditures of money, for which ability of the character required to decide such questions is compensated far beyond any compensation ever received by any of the men who compose the Commission.

It can not be said that a man as a $900 clerk in a musty office in one of the Department buildings, surrounded by the cobwebs of a hundred years, having had no contact with great public questions, is if to decide the wisdom of an expenditure for the development of a great comparing enterprise for the development of a great commercial enterprise.

If his wisdom is such that his opinion can be acted upon in matters of such great importance, he would be sought out by the men who have pioneered the great projects which have developed the commerce of the nation. Long years of training in a clerkship may qualify an individual to compile figures which are placed before him, to foot them up accurately and make beautiful lines on paper, but his judgment would not induce the captains of industry to invest money in manufactures, in agriculture, in commerce, in mining and milling. The men whose judgment is sought for in matters of this kind are the These captains of inmen who have made the nation great. dustry are leaders in enterprise, not clerks under orders to make reports at will—to reach conclusions made in advance for Captains of industry are men who think in advance of their fellows, who realize what is needed to facilitate the commerce of the nation and to prepare for the coming necessities of the increasing population, to build up, to manage, to develop, to utilize, to master, to systematize, and to make for success.

The highways of commerce are strewn with the wrecks of commercial enterprises which have failed to make proper provision for the growth and development of their business. Governments, like individuals, must look to the future if they hope to live and prosper.

There is a universal demand for rate regulation on all of our railways, and it is the general conviction that the improvement of our waterways is the cheapest, quickest, and best way to forever settle the question.

The construction of such a waterway as the one I propose when completed would be the strongest section that could be written into an interstate-commerce law. It is a section about which there could be no legal controversy. The Supreme Court could not misconstrue its meaning. That it would regulate freight rates no one can deny. That we must regulate them everybody will agree. The policy of Government ownership must not be thought of, but the policy of regulation must be enforced most rigidly; and the best way, in my judgment, to enforce it is by the construction and control of waterways throughout the interior of the nation.

But the chairman of the committee says the plan is a new ene; that it has not been long enough considered to be understood; and when told that it has been considered since 1846 he says that it has been too long considered. Which one of the positions taken by the chairman of the committee is correct? He says that no project has been or will be considered except such as may be recommended by this Board of Engineers. The Board of Engineers which failed to recommend this project had nothing to do with making the survey. The survey was made by engineers from civil life, as I understand it, under the direction of the War Department. They recommended the feasibility of the project.

What mysterious influence could have been used to induce the Commission to report against its commercial value? The law authorizing the survey gave them no such power. It provided that a survey and report should be made on the feasibility of the project. That was as far as the law authorized the board to go. To go further was to assume prerogatives which the board did not possess. The assumption of such prerogatives is a usurpation of power that ought not to be tolerated.

They say the tonnage originating is an indefinite and unknown quantity. True, it would be difficult to ascertain accurately what the tonnage over any proposed development might be. No living man could determine that in advance.

No one dreamed of the immense tonnage that would go through the Soo Canal when it was first proposed. In fact, we are told that the engineers expressed serious doubt as to the probable financial success of that splendid enterprise when it was first suggested, but yet everybody will agree to-day that the tonnage through the Soo Canal is so enormous that even now large expenditures of money are necessary to create added facilities for the movement of the vessels which are obliged to tie up for a week at a time in order to pass through this canal. Over 30,000,000 tons went through the Soo Canal last year.

It is said that the cost of the construction of the waterway from the Lakes to the Gulf would be enormous. True, the people understand that such a waterway could not be constructed without the expenditure of large sums of money, but they regard it as a commercial necessity; and capable, experienced business' men believe that it will be worth to our country many times its estimated cost.

If the Committee on Rivers and Harbors wished to be consistent it would have recommended an appropriation for this great improvement. Other projects have been recommended by the committee, the commercial value of which have been recommended against by the War Department and its engineers, and I beg to call especial attention to the one at Cold Spring Inlet, Cape May, New Jersey, of which the engineers have this to say. I am not going to read all the engineers say, but I will content myself with reading just that portion of what they say in one of the concluding reports:

This is a somewhat peculiar case, an undeveloped port with absolutely no commerce, but with large possibilities of commercial importance. The district officer makes no recommendation in this report as to the propriety of the National Government undertaking the work of making the channel entrance, and it appears to me to be a question solely for the wisdom of Congress.

General Mackenzie's report to the Secretary of War, dated January 2, 1907, says:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, January 2, 1907.

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, January 2, 1907.

Sir: I have the honor to submit herewith for transmission to Congress reports of August 14, 1905, and December 15, 1906, with map, by Maj. C. A. F. Flagler, Corps of Engineers, on preliminary examination and survey, respectively, authorized by the river and harbor at approved March 3, 1905, of Cold Spring Inlet, Cape May, New Jersey, with a view to securing a channel from the inside harbor to deep water and the creation of a harbor of refuge.

Cold Spring Inlet is on the coast of New Jersey, about 3 miles east of the city of Cape May. Within the inlet there was originally a natural basin about 6 feet deep and 60 acres in area. In the throat of the inlet the depth was 29 feet at mean low water, and on the outside a bar on which there was a minimum depth of 3.5 feet at low water about one-half mile out. The present commerce of the locality by water is practically nothing.

Private business interests have purchased a considerable tract of land near the inlet and are now engaged in filling it in for building and improvement purposes. The material for this filling is obtained by dredging, and in this connection it is planned to enlarge the natural basin inside the inlet to about 500 acres in area, with depths of from 30 to 40 feet. Railroad and other interests propose to bulkhead the shores of this basin and make the adjacent lands available for wharves, warehouses, and commercial purposes generally. To complete this elaborate plan for a safe landlocked harbor for commerce and of refuge, it is desired that the General Government provide a suitable connection between it and deep water in the ocean, so as to make the harbor accessible to sengoling vessels.

In the investigation of this project the usual examination and survey have been made and several hearings held. The plan is entirely feasible from an engineering standpoint, but the proposition for the General Government to join with private interests in creating a harbor at a point where there is no p

This concurrence with the Board is in regard to the general object to be attained. The details of the plan demand further consideration, and it is believed that they may very properly be left for determination when the work, if adopted, shall be actually undertaken. Experience at harbors on the Great Lakes where channels are protected by parallel jetties justifies the Board's further recommendation that the bulkheads to be built by private capital should not be placed, as now planned, in practical prolongation of the jetties, as proposed, but should diverge toward the bay, so as to give room for expansion of the waves driven in from the sea.

I am also in accord with the Board's views as to the conditions under which any funds to be appropriated by the United States should become available.

Very respectfully,

A. Mackenzie,

Brig. Gen., Chief of Engineers, U. S. Army.

A. MACKENZIE, Brig. Gen., Chief of Engineers, U. S. Army. The SECRETARY OF WAR.

Then I wish to read this advertisement of the real estate company which owns and controls Cape May. They have sent out a beautiful calendar entitled "Cape May City, N. J., for health, wealth, and recreation. Cape May Real Estate Company." Then they have a map on the back of the calendar pointing out the lots. Then they have a list of lots, giving the size, and then they proceed to say in their advertisement this:

Pittsburg avenue, extending from beach to Schellenger's landing, is 100 feet wide; a magnificent boulevard. Titles absolutely clear and perfect, guaranteed by the Guaranty Title and Trust Company, of Pittsburg, Pa., and policy of life insurance given free with every deed. The property represented above, owned by the Cape May Real Estate Company, is being developed into the finest and most superb seasible resort in the world. The tract comprises 5,400 acres, including 500 acres of land-locked harbor, in which great public and private interest is centered. centered.

Mark you!

The Congress of the United States has ordered a survey for the purpose of making an entrance from the ocean to the harbor. The property has an ocean frontage of nearly 3 miles. The work of development now progressing is of such great magnitude as to astound everyone and has brought great and growing enhancement to property values in Cape May city. Watch it grow this year as never before.

Mark you!

Watch it grow.

One would imagine it was one of those glittering advertisements for the sale of stock in a gold mine.

The two largest dredging companies in the United States, the Atlantic, Gulf. and Pacific Company, of New York, and the Furst-Clark Dredging Company, of Baltimore, are under contract with the Cape May Real Estate Company and are operating a number of dredges day and night, dredging the immense harbor and filling the adjacent property with the material removed.

And mark this:

Shrewd real-estate investors from many sections of the United States show their faith in this proposition by purchasing Cape May property. Join the procession and get some of the great fortunes that are being made here. Do not delay if you want to get the largest returns on your investment. Get in line for profits sure to be made in Cape May city. Many people are buying lots by mail.

Just think of it. The Government of the United States is making a survey, and people are induced thereby to purchase lots by mail lest they might not be able to get in in time to get the large benefits to be derived from the money to be expended from the National Treasury.

You can do likewise. If you can not personally visit the property or our offices, we assure you we will make the best selection possible. Don't delay or you will miss a great opportunity.

SOME OF THE GREAT ATTRACTIONS OF CAPE MAY CITY.

Unquestionably the safest and most magnificent beach in the world. Miles of finished driveways, level as a floor; automobilists' delight. Drives far inland are superb through picturesque country. Boating and fishing unexcelled. Hunters' paradise; game in great variety and abundance in surrounding country. Climate ideal; cooler in summer and warmer in winter than any other New Jersey seaside resort. Purest water from artesian wells inland. Cape May adjoins the fast lands. Fruit and vegetables of all descriptions grow nearby.

To these and other favoring natural attractions the Cape May Real Estate Company is adding immensely important municipal improvements, including a model sewage-disposal plant (completed), graveled and sewered streets, sidewalks, and curbs. In cooperation with the city, an ocean bulkhead, board walk, and beach drive were constructed along the entire ocean front. A grand improvement; everybody says so. Greater ones under way.

The Government is going to spend millions on the improvement.

The Government is going to spend millions on the improvement. Come in before it is too late!

You and your friends want to take advantage of this great money-making chance. Write us and we will give you detailed information. This is the chance of a lifetime. Snap it up for profit making. As our improvements progress, this property will become immensely val-uable to first purchasers. You can become one now.

Now, this is your opportunity. Come in before it is too late. [Applause.] Mark you, this is the thing for the improvement of which the Government is spending millions. Here is a place where great traffic originates. This is the place that needs the aid of the Federal Government in order that navigation may be aided, in order that commerce may be improved, in order that it may meet the demands of the growing population of the nation.

Investigate and be convinced that here's fortune for you. Surer, safer than a gold mine.

How could the committee pass such a place as this without making a contribution from the public Treasury toward its development?

What an inviting prospect. How certain one is of a fortune if the Government will but spend its millions there. There is no money to spare for a great commercial waterway, while millions are wasted on a private enterprise.

Gentlemen, I submit that if this is a proper improvement for which to expend public money, that the improvement advocated by the people of all of the States of the Central West has received but scant consideration at the hands of the men who represent the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, supposed to be giving fair consideration to every question that means advance ment to our commerce and the development of our country.

It is strange that $1,200,000 or more should have been appro priated for such a project under such circumstances, without any evidence whatever that there would ever be any tonnage originating at the point of the improvement to warrant the expenditure, and yet the recommendation is made, evidently, to accommodate a lot of people who are interested in a private enterprise; made, doubtless, to accommodate the Pennsylvania and Reading Railroads, who seem to be preparing to erect terminals at the site of the proposed improvement.

The deep waterway from the Lakes to the Gulf can not be said to be one in which private enterprise is interested. It is a project for the development of the commerce of the nation, in which the people of the nation alone are vitally interested.

We are spending millions of dollars for the construction of the Panama Canal. Is it proposed that when this canal is com-pleted that the grain fields of the country, that the mines, the farms, the factories of the nation are to be excluded from its use, or is the expenditure which is being made for the construc-tion of this gigantic project being made only for the accommodation of the shipping of foreign nations?

It is proposed soon to call up a ship subsidy bill for the consideration of the House. The people of the Middle West feel that every section of the nation should be given equal opportunity to enjoy the privileges which the establishment of lines of ships under such conditions might afford, and if the country that surrounds the Mississippi Valley is denied the privilege of sending its products by water to meet the ships that are to sail from southern ports into South American republics, it can be seen that they would naturally be opposed to the granting of such subsidies.

The time has come when the people of the Middle West will demand consideration at the hands of the nation's legislators. Demand it because their claims are just; demand it because the country embraced within the Mississippi Valley is capable of producing more from its mines, fields, forests, and its farms than any other similar area in the nation; demand it because water is recognized as the cheapest transportation known to commerce; demand it because the nucleus of this great waterway is already constructed and ought to be utilized; demand it because every city on the Great Lakes will be able to ship direct to the ocean.

I trust the following amendment, which is pending, will be adopted :

Toward the construction of a navigable waterway 14 feet in depth, the locks, however, to be so constructed as to permit of a depth of water of 21 feet over the miter sills, from the south end of the channel of the Sanitary District of Chicago near Lockport, Ill., by way of the Des Plaines and Illinois rivers, to the mouth of said Illinois River, and from the mouth of the Illinois River by way of the Missispipi River to St. Louis, Mo., in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 263, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session, $5,000,000: Provided. That a contract or contracts may be entered into by the Secretary of War for such materials and work as may be necessary to complete said navigable waterway, to be paid for as appropriations may from time to time be made by law, not to exceed in the aggregate $26,000,000 exclusive of the amount herein appropriated.

That the necessity for such an improvement as this deep waterway from the Lakes to the Gulf exists can be evidenced in no better way than by the statement of Mr. James J. Hill, president of the Great Northern Railroad, which is as follows:

The business of the United States is to-day so congested that from every portion of the country arises clamor for relief. The railroads everywhere are taxed beyond their power. The people of the United States, therefore, are face to face with the greatest business problem that has ever threatened the nation. During recent years the volume of business has increased and is increasing with extraordinary rapidity, while the necessary additional trackage and terminals have not been equal to the demands upon them. The resulting situation is a freight blockade of enormous proportions, especially at all terminal points. How to remedy this is a problem, financial, mechanical, and physical. No time should be lost in applying such measures of remedy as may be possible, and the first step toward this is to reach a proper understanding of actually existing conditions. The following figures, compiled from the official reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and covering the growth of the railroad business for the last ten years, exhibit the significant facts:

These figures show the cause of delay in the national traffic movement which threatens to bring industry to a standstill. Within the last ten years the volume of railroad business in this country has increased over 110 per cent. Meanwhile the railroads have endeavored to meet it; for, while the increase in locomotives has been 35 per cent in number, and in freight cars of all classes 45 per cent, the substitution of larger cars for smaller, better methods of loading and increase in weight of locomotives, have greatly added to the carrying capacity of the railroads so far as rolling stock is concerned. Moreover, equipment is being increased as rapidly as capital and labor can do it. The car manufacturing establishments of the country have all the orders they can fill for a year ahead. The locomotive works are equally busy. There are and will be cars enough to carry the country's traffic if the cars can be moved, but engines and cars must have tracks upon which they may run.

A striking tale is told by the statistics of railroad building in the United States. Not only is it true, as stated above, that there has been in the ten years ending 1904 an increase of but 21 per cent in mileage, but the most impressive fact is that railroad building has, within a generation, fallen off just as the demand upon trackage has increased. At this moment, when that demand is greatest and the whole country is clamoring for relief, it is the smallest in years. These are the figures:

	Total mileage.	Increase. *		Increase
		Amount.	Per cent.	per an- num.
1870	52, 398 93, 671 163, 597 213, 904 220, 000	40, 773 69, 926 50, 307 6, 250	77 74.6 30.75 2.9	Per cent. 7, 7 7, 46 2, 19 1, 45

The limit of service of a common carrier has been reached when it has moving at all times over its system as many cars as can be run upon its tracks with safety, and transferred and dispatched from its terminals and junction points without unreasonable delay. Beyond that point increase of business can not be handled by increasing cars and engines. The disparity between the growth of traffic and the additions to railroad mileage and the extension of terminals, shown by new mileage of less than 1½ per cent a year since 1904, to take care of a traffic increase averaging 11 per cent a year for ten years past, presents and explains the real problem.

The best judgment of many conservative railroad men in the country is that an immediate addition of not less than 5 per cent per annum to the railroad trackage of the country for, say sive years, should be made to relieve the situation and put an end to unreasonable delays in the transaction of business.

transaction of business.

Investigations recently made by public officials, and facts accessible before those investigations, disclose that the rallroads of the country have been endeavoring to meet the growing demand upon them. In order to handle this enormous addition of 110 per cent in business with only 21 per cent more track, they have utilized as never before the carrying capacity of each mile. Not only were there 35 per cent more locomotives and 45 per cent more cars in service in 1905 than in 1895, but each engine and car did much more work. The passenger-miles traveled per locomotive increased from 1,218,967 to 2,043,553, or more than 68 per cent, and the ton-miles per freight locomotive from 4,258,821 to 6,690,700, or more than 57 per cent. Trains run faster, cars are larger, locomotives are more powerful, and methods of handling the business have so improved as to increase the general efficiency. Only by these improvements has the disparity between trackage and business done been prevented thus far from creating widespread suffering and loss. Only thus has the country been enabled to do a growing work with an almost stationary machine.

prevented thus far from creating widespread suffering and loss. Only thus has the country been enabled to do a growing work with an almost stationary machine.

But the trouble of business grows and deepens. It is not confined to any section of the country. And it is in the great centers that the inadequacy of terminal facilities makes the pressure most severe and prevents the free flow of traffic. The Great Northern Railway Company has thirty-four switch engines in use in the Twin Cities, while it uses only twenty-eight engines in hauling freight into and out of the same.

No additions to equipment and no increased efficiency in operation can take the place of the imperatively required new trackage and terminal facilities. The country must have, as rapidly as it can be built, additional tracks and terminal facilities, of which it stands in such need to-day. Suppose that only 25 per cent additional track with necessary terminals and equipment is to be built during the next five years; for with less, the country can not escape severe distress and business depression, can not conduct promptly the volume of business depression, can not conduct promptly the volume of business even now in sight. Our total railroad mileage is about 220,000 miles. A 25 per cent increase would mean the building of 55,000 miles of new track, much of which would be additional tracks to existing lines; and if five years were allowed for the work it would be necessary to build 11,000 miles each year. But that is not all. One-third would have to be added to this amount for terminal and passing tracks. Add 33 per cent to 55,000 miles, and the total is 73,333 miles; or, say, before the end of five years, in round numbers, 75,000 miles of track as the requirement for the country to meet immediate needs. As most of this additional track would be built where traffic is heaviest, for double-tracking existing lines, it must be expensive work. Grades should be lowered, curvature reduced, and highway and other bridges built and expensiv terminals created.

curvature reduced, and highway and other bridges built and expensive terminals created.

No practical man would accept a contract for furnishing the facilities required, including additional equipment and terminal facilities, for less than $75,000 per mile. The question of terminals alone is almost prohibitive. Terminals now in use were acquired when property was cheap and can be enlarged only by heavy outlay. In many cities it is not even a question of cost, since the area necessary to handle railroad business properly is not to be had at any price; does not exist within the business section where terminals must be located, unless the business itself were destroyed to make room. The new work, then, would amount to $5,500,000,000 in round numbers, or a yearly average of $1,100,000,000. That is the sum which should be spent before the commerce of the country can be moved properly. It is just twice the total amount of the bonded debt of the United States after the close of the civil war. It is more than twice the entire currency in circulation in the country, and only a little less than twice the deposits in all the savings banks in the United States put together. That is the money that should be raised somehow, and that within the next five years if the business of the country is to escape prostration.

Almost all the complaints made to-day, either by shippers or by operating railroad men, of obstacles and dangers in transportation service are due to deficient trackage. The defect can be corrected only by building more track.

are due to deficient trackage. The defect can be corrected only by building more track.

The movement of freight cars is more unsatisfactory to the railroads than it can be to their customers. The average speed of a freight train is from 12 to 15 miles per hour. The average distance traveled by each freight car is about 25 miles per day. That is, the entire freight equipment of the country is employed to the fair limit of its capacity but two hours out of the twenty-four. On single-track lines freights must wait on sidings while passenger trains have the right of way; cars stand for days or weeks in yards or at transfer points awaiting their turn.

It has come to pass also that the inadequacy of trackage takes heavy must wait on sidings while passenger trains have the right of way; cars stand for days or weeks in yards or at transfer points awaiting their turn.

It has come to pass also that the inadequacy of trackage takes heavy toll of life and limb. In 1895 the number of passenger miles traveled for every passenger killed or injured was 4,789,173; in 1905 it was 2,184,830. The ton-mileage for each nonpassenger killed or injured was 2,278,438 in 1895 and 2,201,011 in 1905. Yet during this time cars were being equipped everywhere with safety devices, and all the railroads were exhausting ingenuity in guarding against accident. The terrible increase of casualties in proportion to passenger and freight mileage is part of the price the public pays for crowding business so that it can be moved only at some sacrifice of safety. The situation appeals to all the traveling public as well as to every shipper and to every man connected with the operation of railroads in this country.

Our population is now increasing at the rate of more than 2,000,000 per annum, and the growth will soon be 2,500,000. The demand upon the transportation systems of the country grows accordingly. Almost everything that ministers to human necessity, except such products of the farm as are consumed on the farm, must be carried by the railroad for a longer or shorter distance. The total value of farm products themselves doubled in the thirty years after 1870, and is now estimated at almost twice the figures of five years ago. In the last ten years the output of petroleum has more than doubled, that of pig iron increased 150 per cent, and the value of manufactured products of the country rose from $9,372,437,283, in 1890, to $13,039,279,566, in 1900. All the additions to our imports and exports, every activity in every department of industry, means just so much more work for the carrier systems of the country. And they, as to available trackage, are little better than at a standstill. For of the 4,000 or 5,000 miles that are built in a year, the greater pa expansion of old ones, the development of the country as measured by the increased business of the l'ostal Department, all indicate the vol-ume of the burden placed upon the railroads. The following figures, compiled from Poor's Manual of Railroads, show the intense activity of the last five years as compared with the decline in railroad con-struction:

Miles of railroad operated Passenger mileage Freight mileage	191, 861 16, 313, 284, 471 141, 162, 109, 413	215, 506 23, 906, 420, 668 187, 375, 621, 537	Per cent. 12,3 46.5 32,7

The number of passenger miles traveled in this country for each mile of railroad in it, according to these figures, has increased 30 per cent in the five years, and the number of ton-miles for each mile of track has grown 18 per cent. As these percentages are calculated on the actual number of miles of road existing at the beginning and the end of the period, respectively, they measure the additional burden on every foot of track. It is no wonder that, with this extra work to do per mile, a work not equally distributed, but in some sections rising to a far higher ratio, the limit of effective operation has been reached. The highest direction and the best economy is to have trackage, equipment, and other facilities properly adjusted to the volume of business, and then keep moving it in a harmonious and useful way. To any such system, by which alone present distress can be relieved and future disaster averted, more trackage is the first and most indispensable condition.

aster averted, more trackage is the first and most indispensable condition.

The problem and the necessity are enormous. At 140 tons to the mile, it would require 2,000,000 tons of steel rails every year to furnish the 15,000 miles of track required. This is nearly two-thirds of the product of all the rolling mills in the United States. It would call for the labor of 200,000 men in grading, besides track layers, bridge builders, and others. Labor even for such extraordinary extensions and improvements as are now being made is not to be had in sufficient quantities on any terms. And it demands, as has been seen, the investment in permanent railroad plant of $1,100,000,000 a year for five years to provide the railroads of the country with means to handle properly the business already in sight, not allowing for future growth. This is the real railroad problem of the United States; and it is one which people have been singularly slow to perceive and reluctant to realize, although it is written on every page of industrial statistics and calls to the passer-by from every signal tower, every siding, and every railroad yard from the Atlantic to the Pacific. To all appearances, the commerce of the country has touched a barrier which is almost insurmountable. surmountable raincad yard from the Atlantic to the Facinic Available in surmountable.

Two remedies must be found. The prohibitory expense now attached to enlargement of terminals at many points, and the absolute lack of available space at any price, may be met by a decentralization of traffic. There must be more points for export, more interior markets. A 15-foot canal or channel from St. Louis to New Orleans would go further to relieve the entire Middle West and Southwest than any other work that could be undertaken. With such a depth of water a single powerful towboat would carry from thirty to forty trainloads. Terminal troubles admit of a more general diffusion of business, permitting transfers to take place and forwarding to be done where land can be secured in adequate quantities and at more reasonable prices. To this the traffic system of the country must be adjusted. The heavy transfers must be made away for the larger cities.

The construction account, however, is the first consideration. It is not by accident that railroad building has declined to its lowest within a generation, at the very time when all other forms of activity have been growing most rapidly. The investor declines to put his money into enterprises under ban of unpopularity, and even threatened by individuals and political parties with confiscation or transfer to the State. The withdrawal of capital from this field is one of the bottom causes of the great decline in railroad building at the very time when the growth of the country in other respects has been most marked. There has been no time since 1893 when there was more difficulty in raising money for railroad purposes than at present. This feeling must be removed and greater confidence be mutually established if any considerable portion of the vast sum necessary is to be available for the work.

First, there must be a realization by the country of the embargo upon business and of the fact that the cause is insufficient railroad trackage. This fact has, strangely enough, come upon the public by surprise. Even now, and even among those who should be most alert and best informed, there is little apparent comprehension of the desperate need that business already feels and that is expressed in delayed freight, car shortages, and all the discomforts and injuries voiced by the complaints of shippers. Then there must be a fair, intelligent, and loyal cooperation on the part of the whole people in what is for them a vital movement to make traffic facilities equal to the demands. Nothing compares with this in magnitude or importance since the close of the war of the rebellion. It will take time, patience, and the expenditure of an enormous amount of money. The task of providing even modestly for the future is a colossal one. It not only involves gigantic physical and financial operations, but it is conditioned upon a rational, just, and patriotic attitude upon the part of the whole people. It will require the best thought and the best effort of this generation to avert the evil that now casts its shadow upon farmer, manufacturer, and merchant to arrest the progress of the paralysis that is laying its grip upon the heart of commence, and to restore the wholeseme circulation, without which there can not be life and growth in either individual or the Commonwealth.

The great States bordering on the Mississippi Valley are in earnest. Their people are aroused. They will demonstrate the untruth of the assertion made on the floor of this House that no public sentiment exists for this great improvement. Everybody living in every State bordering on the Mississippi Valley favors this project. The State legislature of Illinois and the legislature of the State of Missouri have passed resolutions representing the sentiment of the people of these States. They favor appropriations for this improvement. They not only want this deep waterway from the Lakes to the Gulf, but they favor the systematic improvement of all the waterways in the Mississippi Valley, including the Missouri, the Ohio, the Mississippi, and all other navigable rivers in the country. These figures are a complete answer to any argument against the systematic improvement of the natural highways of commerce, and prove conclusively that appropriations made for such a purpose are productive of results beneficial to all the people. [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. How much time does the gentleman from Missouri desire?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. About twenty-five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for twentyfive minutes

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, it is not often that a more important question comes before Congress than that which is now claiming the attention of this House. The life of commerce is transportation. And certainly the country has never been more in need of increased transportation facilities than at I believe that a false opinion has existed in the present time. Congress as to what should be done with the waterways of our country. It has been the idea of most of the Representatives that we should depend upon the railroads to carry our commerce and expend all of our energies in the improvement and deepening of harbors which constitute the terminals of the railroads. I believe, Mr. Chairman, Members of this House should begin to feel, as their constituents at home long have felt, that we should develop not only our harbors, but our inland waterways as well. My friend, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. Rans-DELL], has advanced the idea that there should be annual instead of biennial appropriations for the purpose of improving our rivers and our harbors. In that view I most heartily concur. Every year should see a large appropriation passed for the improvement and for the extension of our waterways. It should not be a niggardly appropriation. I have received letters from my constituents, in great number, asking me to favor an annual river and harbor bill carrying $50,000,000. I for one am ready to vote for an annual appropriation of $50,000,000, and if others will be as progressive as I think I am we will vote double that amount, and say that every year shall see a river and harbor bill carrying $100,000,000.

I do not belong to that number of this House, quite considerable, who think that to improve our rivers and harbors it is necessary to take away from the Government revenues that are now being devoted to other proper objects. I would improve our rivers and our harbors as amply as their importance demands. but I would not take it from the naval appropriation bill; I would not take it from the agricultural appropriation bill; I would not take it from the other necessities of the Government. I believe our revenues are ample for all these purposes if frugality is exercised.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that I am expressing the views of the people of the United States when I advocate this large appropriation for our waterways. I believe that the Members of this House who are afraid to support large appropriations for this purpose do not fully understand the sentiment of the people whom they represent.

I was impressed yesterday, in listening to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. Ransdell], when he differentiated between the two kinds of river and harbor improvements that are being made—one, the deepening of our harbors, which of necessity amounts to increasing the terminal facilities of the railroads. This is a proper work and in all proper cases shall have my support. But, Mr. Chairman, there has been a disposition to lag behind in the improvement of our interior waterways, the only means at the command of the people for furnishing competition in transportation rates. I have in my possession a table compiled by the secretary of the Interstate Commerce Commission, showing the difference in rates which prevail be-tween inland points and those that have water competition. For instance, take my own State. From the city of St. Louis to Norfolk, Va., the rate on first-class freight is 88 cents per hundred, while from St. Louis to Guthrie, Okla., it is $1.30 per From St. Louis to New Orleans the rate is 90 cents per hundred. From St. Louis to Little Rock, only half the distance, the rate is 100 cents a hundred pounds. Half the distance to New Orleans pays a larger freight rate than the whole distance. Why? Because the Mississippi River serves as a competitor for the railroads in carrying the products of the Mississippi Valley to the Gulf. All of this has been accomplished in spite of the obstructions in the neglected channel of

We know that the number of schemes that are pressed upon Congress, all worthy in themselves, is so great that it is a difficult task to take care of them all rapidly. We have heard a number of them discussed here yesterday and to-daythem the waterway between the drainage canal from Chicago to St. Louis and from St. Louis to the Gulf.

We all favor that proposition. But, Mr. Chairman, I believe I choose to count myself with that number who favor it as a whole. I believe if you intend to have a waterway from the Lakes to the Gulf it should be undertaken as a unit and put through as a unit. Complete surveys and estimates should first be had, so that we may know just what it is we are undertaking and what it will probably cost. If 14 feet of water from Chicago to the mouth of the Mississippi River is desired, I will give it my support. If a greater depth is desired, I will vote for it. I am in favor of a liberal appropriation for the improvement of the Mississippi River between St. Louis and Cairo. deed, I believe that is the key to the situation of all of the Mississippi Valley above the mouth of the Ohio River. I believe the drainage-canal proposition depends for its success upon the completion of that portion of the Mississippi River between the mouth of the Ohio and the mouth of the Missouri. The same is true of the Missouri River and its tributaries

Mr. Chairman, in the little time that I shall claim the attention of this House I want to address myself to a project which, considering its importance, has been neglected more than any other. I allude to the improvement of the Missouri River. It happened that when the explorers started out on this continent they first came to the Mississippi River above its junction with the Missouri, and to that accidental circumstance is due the fact that it is called the Mississippi River. The main stream is the Missouri River, rising in the Rocky Mountains, passing on to the Gulf, with the Mississippi simply its tributary. The Missouri River, from its source to its mouth below New Orleans, is the greatest waterway in the world. [Applause.] If it were properly improved, ocean-going vessels could load at Sioux City and unload at Liverpool.

The water is there. All that is needed is the improvement. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Hepburn], who always speaks interestingly if not encouragingly upon this subject, said it had been estimated that to improve the Mississippi and the Missouri rivers so that they would have a definite channel and carry the commerce which waited for them would cost a hundred thousand dollars per mile. What of it? Mr. Chairman, there are railroads in this world that cost more than a hundred thousand dollars a mile to build them, and yet their construction were profitable enterprises. If we could build a waterway from Sioux City to the Gulf of Mexico at a hundred thousand dollars a mile it would be a cheap investment for this Govern-Think of the vast commerce that comes out of the Mississippi Valley. Why, Mr. Chairman, think of the vast commerce that comes out of the Missouri Valley. Think what it would mean to that commerce, to the producers of that commerce, if this water transportation could cut in two the rates of freight which they now pay. We have heard it said here that we are not in possession of the revenues for these great enterprises. Mr. Chairman, I say that we are. Let us take the money that is being poured into the Philippine Islands, let us take the money that is being poured into the public-building bill, let us take the money that is being poured into the unnecessary extravagances of this Government and we can make that the greatest waterway on the face of the earth.

The Missouri River has been kept in the background so long, it has been neglected so long, that this House is not as familiar with the conditions there as it should be. We were told in Congresses gone by that that river had been taken off the map; when we went into the Rivers and Harbors Committee room to look at the map of the waterways of this Republic, the Missouri River was not to be found.

It is very natural under such conditions that we along the banks of that stream are a little uncertain as to the policies we should adopt. I am not here to raise a quarrel with anybody who differs from me as to what should be done. At the beginning of the last Congress and again at the beginning of this I introduced a bill providing for the improvement of the Missouri River by the expenditure of $5,000,000 a year for a period of twenty years. It seemed to some that my proposition was extravagant; but, Mr. Chairman, a private corporation would undertake the building of a railroad through such a country as that, with such a commerce as is there, and consider it a moderate proposition.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I was saying that we along the Missouri River have not been certain as to how we would again begin to get the Missouri River back on the map and provide for its improvement. I introduced the bill to which I have referred. My colleague from Missouri [Mr. Ellis], who is as ardently in favor of the improvement as I and who is a member of the committee, had a more conservative view.

He thought that the better thing to do was to get any sort of recognition the River and Harbor Committee would give to us. The River and Harbor Committee has reported the appropriation in line with the recommendation of my colleague, Mr. Ellis. He got precisely what he asked for. I thought that he ought to have asked for more, and I think yet that he ought to have asked for more; but, Mr. Chairman, he, being on the committee, was charged with more responsibility than I, and he asked for the smaller and more modest sum, and it has gone on the appropriation bill. At the proper time I shall offer an amendment to increase that sum, but if it should not be increased I shall, for one, refrain from any criticism of the Rivers and Harbors Committee upon that subject. I do not mean to say by that that I am content with the appropriation we have received for that great stream, but I am thankful that the committee has concluded to again place it upon the map of those streams that are to receive appropriations for their improvement.

In this connection I want to say, for the chairman of that great committee, that man whom I believe is more capable than any other Member of this House to handle this great bill, that he has shown a willingness to change the views he has heretofore entertained in regard to the navigability of our river. He has shown a disposition to be just and to give us the exact sum for which our representative on that committee has asked, and to assure us that if we can develop commerce he is willing to progress in the magnitude of the appropriation which we are to receive. Many of us are sorely disappointed that our sections have not received the appropriations to which they were entitled, but I believe there is not a Member of this House who has not unbounded confidence in the ability, fairness, fidelity, and disinterested patriotism of the chairman of the committee [Mr. Burron].

There are two streams in my territory concerning which I desire to make some remarks.

The first is the Gasconade River, which carries a commerce of 29,837 tons—in round numbers, 30,000 tons. It traverses a portion of our State where there are not many railroads. It affords the only means of transportation for a large number of people who live in my district and the districts of my colleagues, Mr. Clark and Mr. Murphy. It is the only means they have of getting their products to market. It is not in good navigable condition, but it may be made so. My colleague, Mr. Clark, and I conferred about this matter, and after a conference I introduced a bill asking for a small sum for its maintenance and for its survey. The committee has been kind enough to give us both. With a small expenditure the tonnage of that stream can be multiplied tenfold in the space of one or two years. [Applause.]

Another stream in my district is the Osage River. Before the war the State of Missouri undertook to provide for the improvement of that stream, and I believe at one time spent $70,000 in that enterprise. There was a time when Governor McClurg maintained a fleet of boats on that stream that carried the commerce from the Missouri River that supplied all the southwestern portion of our State. There was not then simply a boat but a fleet or line of boats constantly engaged in transportation. What was done then can be done now. If commerce was carried then at an expenditure on the part of the State of $60,000 or $70,000, what could be done now if that stream was improved as it ought to be by the General Government?

The General Government has jurisdiction of the stream; it belongs to the General Government; it is one of the streams the Government should improve for the benefit of the country not of Missouri alone, but for all the people of the land. It is a highway that should be kept up, a free highway, a Government-owned highway, operated in the interest of the people without any embargo laid upon its tonnage. [Applause.] the Government of the United States was willing, and if it were a proper thing to do, to turn that river over to private capital, it would carry thousands of tons of freight under such improvement as private capital would be willing to put there. If private capital could develop that river into a great highway carrying commerce of the country, earning a handsome return, why could not the Government which taxes the people keep that highway in repair for the benefit of the people? [Applause.] You are willing to pour multitudinous millions of dollars into the harbors of Galveston, New Orieans, Norfolk, Mobile, Philadelphia, Boston, and New York, and other railroad terminals. Then, sir, why not make similar appropriations for the internal waterways that the people may have relief from the extortion of the railroads? [Applause.]

When we show a willingness to vote appropriations for these harbors I think that other parts of the country ought to show a willingness to come to the aid of the Mississippi Valley and give us that greatest of rate regulation, water transportation. From the White House down to the country post-[Applause.] office agitation has been going on in favor of the regulation of railroad rates. Has it been done? I have just quoted rates showing you that for more than 1,200 miles distant from St. Louis to Norfolk, Va., first-class freight is 88 cents a hundred, and that from St. Louis out to our neighboring town of Guthrie, Okla., the rate is $1.30-nearly twice as much for less than half Okla, the rate is $1.50—nearly twice as much that? Does the distance. Does your rate regulation correct that? Does the distance Commission give relief? No. There is only one means, Mr. Chairman, by which we can regulate the railroads as long as they remain private property, and that is by putting the waterways in competition with them. plause.] I believe there is no man here so unfamiliar with the conditions as to make it necessary that I should make a comparison of rates between water points and nonwater points, but I will ask the indulgence of the House while I take some figures from the speech of my friend the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Humphreys]. Here are three towns in Mississippi equidistant from St. Louis-virtually so-and all reached by the same two railroads, viz: Greenville, Greenwood, and Winona, Greenville is on the Mississippi River, Greenwood is on the Yazoo River, and Winona is not on any river. From St. Louis to Greenville the rate is 90 cents, from St. Louis to Greenwood the rate is 96 cents, and from St. Louis to Winona the rate is $1.14. The difference between Greenville and Winona is 24 cents a hundred, quite an item in itself to pay for transportation. It is enough of itself to pay the transportation; the excess that Winona pays is as much as the whole rate ought to be. Why is it that Greenwood and Greenville enjoy that special advantage over Winona? It is because they are situated upon the lines of water transportation, and the people there get the benefit of it. Then, if that is true where the Mississippi River carries transportation below St. Louis it would be equally true if the Gasconade, if the Osage, and if the Missouri were put into such position that they could afford competition in transportation to the railroad companies.

"Oh," somebody says, "water transportation is too slow." Mr. Chairman, my home city is 125 miles from St. Louis. I knew freight to be loaded onto the cars in St. Louis this summer that required ninety days to bring it 125 miles. It was ninety days after that freight had been loaded into the cars in St. Louis before it was delivered. A boat could have brought it at half the rate charged for it and could have delivered it within twenty-four or forty-eight hours. There is no valid argument which can be presented against the improvement of our rivers, and, Mr. Chairman, we shall fall short of our duty to our constituents if we higgle about the amounts of the appropriations that are to be made for that purpose. Let every man in this House be true to his constituency. Let us stand shoulder to shoulder with the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] and bring into this House a large annual appropriation for the betterment of these waterways. [Applause.]

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I am well aware of the difficulsouthwestern portion of our State. There was not then simply a boat but a fleet or line of boats constantly engaged in transportation. What was done then can be done now. If this great rivers and harbors bill, carrying as it does authorization.

tions of varying degrees of merit to the extent of $83,000,000, to be distributed in different parts of the United States.

I am also aware of the implied obligations which are upon Members whose communities have received even trivial contributions from the grand total sum. I am not here to deny there are numerous worthy projects contained in this bill, and that the great majority of them may be entirely worthy of recommendation, but I am here to seriously and emphatically criticise the failure on the part of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to recognize in a sufficiently substantial way the great project of river improvement creating a ship canal from the Great Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico.

The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors yesterday remarked on the floor that it had not been considered sufficiently to warrant a conclusion; that practically it had not been before the committee excepting for a few months. If there has ever been a question which has received the thorough consideration of the people for almost a century without abatement of interest it has been the project of a deep waterway from the Lakes through the Chicago River, thence by canal to the Des Plaines River, on to the Illinois River, and thence through the Mississippi River, and finally to the Gulf.

As early as August 1, 1674, Joliet found the sources of the Chicago and the Des Plaines rivers in a common pool of water, and wrote to his friend, Father Dablin, as follows:

A very important advantage, and one which some, perhaps, will find it hard to credit, is that we could quite easily go to Florida in boats, and by a very good navigation. There would be but one canal to make—by cutting only one-half a league of prairie—to pass from the Lake of Illinois (Lake Michigan) into the St. Louis River (the Des Plaines River). The route to be taken is this: The bark should be built on Lake Erle, which is near Lake Ontario. It could easily pass from Lake Erle to Lake Huron, from which it would enter the Lake of Illinois. At the extremity of this lake would be the cut or canal of which I have spoken, to have a passage to the St. Louis River, which emptles into the Mississippi. The bark having entered this river, could easily sail to the Gulf of Mexico.

Again, in 1817, Samuel A. Storrow, Judge-Advocate in the United States Army, to a letter of Major-General Brown, wrote

Before the Chicago River enters Lake Michigan its branches unite, the one proceeding from the north, the other from the southwest, where it takes its rise from the very fountain of the Plein (Despiaines), or Illinois, which flows in an opposite direction. The source of these two rivers illustrates the geographical phenomenon of a reservoir on the very summit of a dividing ridge. In the autumn they are both without any apparent fountain, but are formed within a mile and a half of each other by some imperceptible undulations of the prairie, which drain it and lead it in different directions. In the spring the space between the two is a single sheet of water, the common reservoir of both, in the center of which there is no current toward either of the opposite streams. This circumstance creates the singular fact of the insulation of all of the United States except Louisiana, making the circumnavigation of them practicable from the Gulf of St. Lawrence to that of Mexico, with the single hindrance of the Falls of Niagara. The situation of the Chicago and De Plein rivers should not escape national attention. The ground between the two is without rocks, and with little labor would admit of a permanent connection between the waters of the Illinois and Lake Michigan.

On August 6, 1814, Niles's Register, of Baltimore, reflected

On August 6, 1814, Niles's Register, of Baltimore, reflected the condition of public sentiment on this great subject, which was at that time being discussed in the United States Congress. It said:

By the Illinois River it is probable that Buffalo may be united with New Orleans by inland navigation through Lakes Erie, Huron, and Michigan, to the Illinois River, and down that river to the Mississippi. What a route! How stupendous the idea! How dwindles the importance of all the artificial canals of Europe compared with this water communication !

In 1821 the State of Illinois caused a partial survey of the entire route to be made for the purpose of demonstrating the practicability of the undertaking

Then followed the grant by Congress to the State of 200,000 acres of public land to be disposed of for the benefit of work of construction, and Illinois passed a law for the construction of the Illinois-Michigan Canal in 1829, but it was not begun until 1836 and completed in 1848, connecting the Chicago River with the Des Plaines River, and furnishing the missing link of con-nection with a depth of 6 feet. In its day and generation the Illinois-Michigan Canal was of great commercial value to the State not only by the actual tonnage carried and tolls collected, but by its influence on railroad rates after that means of transportation came into existence, and even to-day it is claimed by shippers in that State that a preceptible difference is manifest in railroad rates in seasons when this old canal can still be used to some extent and when it is not available in any degree by reason of ice or other causes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. May I ask, Is there any commerce at all on the canal from the port of Chicago?

Mr. GRAFF. I am talking of the Illinois and Michigan Canal. There is, of course, the Chicago Sanitary District

Canal; that is the one that is proposed to be used in this enterprise.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I understand that.

Mr. GRAFF. And it is now completed, except they have not yet got ready to open it for navigation. They are still at work, and they have about got ready to make complete connections for navigation.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I understand the canal has been completed from Chicago down to Joliet. Mr. GRAFF. To below Lockport.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Is there any commerce on the

Mr. GRAFF. They can not travel on the Sanitary District Canal at all yet.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. You are simply indulging in hope?

Mr. GRAFF. Oh, no; I am talking about the Illinois and Michigan Canal at this time. The Chicago River composes a part of this canal, and there is simply an enormous commerce on that part of the canal.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. What is the depth at the mouth of the Chicago River?
Mr. GRAFF. Thirty-six feet.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. And that runs as far as Joliet?

Mr. GRAFF. Yes, sir.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. And you say there is no commerce on that now?

Mr. MADDEN. It runs up against a stone wall.
Mr. GRAFF. It is not now open, because there is a stone wall that shuts up the end of the canal; but the channels, I was just informed by my colleague, have been opened up.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Is it open up now so as to admit of commerce?

Mr. GRAFF. The bridges have been now arranged so that it will permit the passage of boats. These bridges were opened on the 17th of January

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. How far from the mouth of that canal is it to where the canal would empty into the Mississippi?

Mr. GRAFF. From the mouth of the Sanitary District to the end of the canal is 327.28 miles, from the end of the Illinois River and the Sanitary District and the Chicago River, which is part of it, is 38 miles long, so that the distance is about two hundred and eighty-odd miles.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The distance that is to be covered and has not yet been touched would be in the neighborhood of 280 miles?

Mr. GRAFF. It is about 280 miles, which it is purposed to deepen 200 feet wide and 14 feet deep from the end of the Sanitary District to Grafton, which is the mouth of the Illinois River, and the estimated cost of that is $23,000,000. the board of engineers—

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. You base that estimate of cost on the cost of the drainage canal down to Joliet?

Mr. GRAFF. Oh, no; it would not be based upon that, because the expensive portion of this work has already been done by the people of Chicago, because the difficult part of the work is the rocky section, and that is the section through which the sanitary channel passes, and Chicago has spent $50,000,000 for this purpose. When the Chicago Sanitary District was charfor this purpose. When the Chicago Sanitary District was chartered by the legislature of the State of Illinois there was incorporated in their charter the provision that the channel should be constructed for a ship canal as well as for sanitary purposes, otherwise the people of the State of Illinois would not have granted the charter. This estimate of $23,000,000 is the result of the survey and report of the board of Army engineers under the act of June, 1902. The gentleman from Kansas asked me the distance from the mouth of the sanitary canal to the mouth of the Illinois River.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Or to where you would expect to connect with the Illinois River or with deep water.

Mr. MADDEN. Sixty miles.
Mr. GRAFF. Sixty miles to the Illinois River. You see there is the Des Plaines River, and then that flows into the Illi-The Des Plaines is a branch of the Illinois River.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. From the mouth of the canal you go into the Des Plaines River.

Mr. GRAFF. Yes. Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. And from the Des Plaines River into the Illinois.

Mr. GRAFF. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. And then you follow the Illinois into the Mississippi.

Mr. GRAFF. Down into the Mississippi, and we would have, under the survey and plans, a canal 14 feet deep and 200 feet wide, which runs from below Alton, on the east bank of the Mississippi River, a distance of 18 miles and comes out into the Mississippi River just opposite St. Louis. The cost of the canal from Alton to St. Louis is $6,553,880; the cost of the waterway, 14 feet deep and 200 feet wide, from Lockport to Grafton is $23,543,582, with $1,376,000 additional if the locks to be built be increased to 20 feet in depth, according to the report of the Board of Engineers of the War Department. The proposition of deepening the river after you leave the sanitary district is not difficult, with the exception of a small, rocky section, and after that is passed the sharp declivities in the river cease and it is almost level from that point down to Grafton, and it is a simple proposition of excavation, with no engineering difficulties pre-

In addition to that, the report of the engineers from the War Department, made several years ago, when another survey of the Illinois River was made, declared that the Illinois River preserves its banks better than any other river in the United There are no difficulties regarding silt. There are no difficulties about washing and about changing the channel of the river

The Illinois River is some 800 or 900 feet wide. After this rocky section is passed there is only a fall of 29 feet the whole distance of some 300 miles to Grafton, and it is a simple proposition of dredging.

Now, I desire to advert to a matter that occurred yesterday when I interrogated the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Burton] concerning the reasons why the Hennepin Canal was built.

It was stated at that time that it was built primarily and chiefly because my old friend, Gen. Thomas J. Henderson, from that section, happened to be chairman of the committee; but I did not want to be understood as saying that the Hennepin Canal is valueless and that Congress made a mistake at that time. While I was not then a Member and had no responsibility connected with it, I want to state the testimony given me to-day by Mr. Charles Deere, of Moline, who is president of the Deere Plow Company, I believe, and interested in the Sylvan Steel Company, of Moline, Ill., to the effect that the Hennepin Canal will have a tremendous influence upon freight rates, and that it will be actually utilized in transmitting blooms and steel and iron from Chicago down to the cities of Rock Island, Moline, and Davenport, and, in his judgment, will reduce freight rates one-And I furthermore want to say that I do not wish to be understood as entertaining any other than the highest opinion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Burton]. I have confidence in his ability, and I have just as much confidence in his integrity, and I must at this time give him due credit for the obtaining of a half million dollars to complete this self-same Hennepin Canal, chiefly at my instance, two years ago.

It was placed under the contract system about eight years it was supposed that the amount authorized would ago, and complete it; but it turned out, when they reached the point where the money was all expended about two years ago, that there remained incomplete work which would necessitate an appropriation of half a million dollars, and the River and Harbor Committee, principally through the courtesy of its chairman, gave us that amount, and the result is that the Hennepin Canal will be completed next year and will be a valuable part and parcel of this scheme of waterways.

Mr. DAVIDSON. Will the gentleman state the depth of the Hennepin Canal?

Mr. GRAFF. Seven feet. It was begun fourteen years ago and dragged its weary length along in process of construction through all those years, until about eight years ago it was placed under contract system and then more speedy progress was made.

River conventions have been held throughout the State, until some twenty years ago public opinion crystallized in favor of a depth of 14 feet from Chicago to St. Louis.

This was clearly and definitely known through organized commercial bodies, river improvement associations, and resolutions and statutory enactments passed from time to time by the legislature in our State. On May 29, 1889, the State legislature passed a charter enactment of the Sanitary District of Chicago, authorizing them to construct and operate a drainage and ship canal from Lake Michigan, through the Chicago River, connecting by an artificial channel with the Des Plaines River, and extending from the Chicago River to Lockport, with the following significant sections contained in said law:

If at any time the General Government shall improve the Des Plaines or Illinois rivers, so that the same shall be capable of receiving a flow of 600,000 cubic feet of water per minute, or more, from said channel, and shall provide for the payment of all damages which any extra flow above 300,000 cubic feet of water per minute from such channel may cause to private property, so as to save harmless the said district from all liability therefrom, then such sanitary district shall within one year thereafter enlarge the entire channel leading into said Des Plaines or Illinois rivers from said district to a sufficient size and capacity to produce and maintain a continuous flow throughout the same of not less than 600,000 cubic feet per minute, with a current of not more than 3 miles per hour, and such channel shall be constructed upon such grade as to be capable of producing a depth of water not less than 18 feet throughout said channel, and shall have a width of not less than 160 feet at the bottom.

24. When such channel shall be completed and the water turned therein, to the amount of 300,000 cubic feet of water per minute, the same is hereby declared a navigable stream, and whenever the General Government shall improve the Des Plaines and Illinois rivers for navigation, to connect with this channel, said General Government shall have full control over the same for navigation purposes, but not to interfere with tis control for sanitary or drainage purposes.

When it is fully completed it will have a capacity, according

When it is fully completed it will have a capacity, according to the report of the board of engineers of the United States Army upon the project which we are now advocating, of about 10,000 cubic feet per second flowing at a low velocity. constructed, it has a maximum depth of 36 feet and a minimum depth of 22 feet, which it is proposed to increase to the maximum depth. It has a general width of 160 feet in the rock section and 202 feet in the dirt section. It constitutes a navigable channel for the largest vessels now navigating the Great With the 6 miles of the Chicago River and the 2 miles extension, it provides a wide and deep channel for 36 miles from Lake Michigan, and the cost when completed some $55,000,000.

The balance of the State are proud of her great city of Chicago, containing two-fifths of our entire population, and the State at large is willing to grant any proper concession to her great city which is reasonable in its character, but it is exceedingly doubtful if the legislation which was passed at the time the original charter of the Sanitary District of Chicago was passed or the subsequent legislation amending the charter could have been prevented had the provisions for the construction of the channel not been provided for a ship canal as well as the needed outlet for the drainage of the metropolis. Right well has Chicago constructed this great engineering feat of severing the divide through the rocky sections of the route, and amply has she constructed the channel for navigation purposes.

January 2, 1900, the Sanitary Channel and Ship Canal was sufficiently finished to begin its use and the waters of the Chicago River were reversed in their current, and fifteen days later the gates at the lower end were opened, and for the first time in centuries the waters of the lake began to flow in a great stream toward the Gulf of Mexico, resuming what geologists all unite in claiming to have been their former course. This stimulated the interest of the people of the State of Illinois and of the neighboring States in their advocacy of the deep waterway cause, and to-day there is no doubt of the universal support of the people of our State of this measure and of its great commercial advantage not simply to the State, but to the entire Mississippi Valley. I was surprised at the statement of the gentleman from Ohio, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, when he said yesterday that he had not heard of this enterprise except within the last six If he has not heard of this enterprise, he has certainly been oblivious to the actions of his own committee.

The act under which the survey and estimates were made for this 14-foot channel from the end of the sanitary district of Chicago to St. Louis was passed in June, 1902—over five years ago—and it was not acted upon by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors without a thorough hearing upon the subject, and that hearing was directed to the advisability of the project before the appropriation of the act of 1902 was made, of $200,000, directing a survey and an estimate of the cost, and the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Ohio, courteously gave the people of the State of Illinois who were interested in this enterprise a hearing in the lobby of the House of Representatives before the entire committee, and before that committee appeared the Illinois Valley Association and Chicago representatives. Chicago has had many thousands of people interested in this enterprise formed into organizations. The Illinois Valley Association is composed of people representing the remaining three-fifths of our State, which is composed of 6,000,000 people. Illinois has borne her share of the political, the commercial, and the moral burdens of the people of this Republic. Illinois has a history which warrants her not in asking from this House an unmerited appropriation, but Illinois is at least entitled to consideration.

And the representatives from Illinois, Chicago organizations, and the Illinois Valley Association in 1902 appeared before the Rivers and Harbors Committee here, represented by one of the most distinguished engineers in the great West, I had the honor to submit a few remarks at that time, as did other members of the Illinois delegation, in behalf of the 14-foot project, and I remember distinctly while that hearing was not taken down and printed and preserved as a document, that the gentleman from Ohio asked Mr. Lyman E. Cooley, supposing the further improvement of the great Mississippi River from St. Louis to the Gulf was found afterwards impracticable. the present enterprise from the end of the Sanitary District to St. Louis would be justifiable, and Mr. Cooley entered upon a discussion of that project alone, standing alone upon the supposition that these sequent improvements, which were considered a part of it from St. Louis to New Orleans, were never carried out. Mr. Cooley stated the kind of crafts which were practicable in a channel of 14 feet in the river, -showing, while 14 feet would not be sufficient for all the vessels of the Great Lakes on our northern boundary, within the boundaries of the channel of a river like that of the Illinois large barges could be constructed and could be utilized for the carrying of traffic which would enter upon that river, and it was after a consideration of the very questions which were submitted at that session of Congress to the board of engineers that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors concluded to recommend to incorporate in the river and harbor appropriation bill the provision which brought out the subsequent survey and estimate on the 14-foot channel from Chicago to St. Louis

Now, then, what period of time elapsed after the action of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and the House and the Senate, not taken without consideration, and the time when the matter came before the Rivers and Harbors Committee for consideration again? A period of over five years. And does the gentleman from Ohio criticise the advocates of this great public improvement because they do not appear before his committee and press the claim of our improvement during the time that the survey was in progress of completion? I should think not. The survey was finally made. What did the law of June 13, 1902, provide? It provided that the War Department should determine the feasibility and cost of the enterprise; whether it was an engineering practicability, and if so, how much would the total cost be, and the War Department proceeded in obedience to the instructions of that law, and they filed in Congress in February, 1905, as complete a survey as ever has been made by the engineers of the United States Government. length of the proposed canal from Chicago to St. Louis will be The distance of the other project, which, we say, 365.28 miles. we hope will follow, from St. Louis to New Orleans, is something like 1,200 miles.

The amount of the business done upon the Chicago River is a forecast of what will follow if an adequate channel is given in the further development of this great water highway through the heart of the continent. But the gentleman from Ohio stated yesterday that hereafter he did not propose to consider in the Rivers and Harbors Committee, so far as he was concerned, any project which did not bear in addition to a favorable report as to its engineering feasibility a report from the engineering board of the War Department as to its advisability. Then, if that is true, Congress proposes to abdicate its functions. What other matters of consideration can there be thought of in connection with a great public work like this save its cost; its engineering feasibility; its commercial advisability? If there be anything left for the House to determine, I would like to know what that would be. It seems to me that the testimony in favor of the desirability of this great waterway in the various generations that have lived and died through almost a century of the history of Illinois ought to have some force with practical men. Ah, but we are dreamers of dreams and we are seers of visions. Why, the achievements of to-day were the dreams of yesterday. If men had first to demonstrate with mathematical accuracy the outcome of new projects never before having a realization in experience the world would halt its advance.

There is something else besides mathematical demonstration that enters into sound judgment. Cold, careful, practical men look into the future and attempt to exploit fields which have been untrodden before, and come to that judgment with a large measure of faith and imagination placed in the combination to arrive at the result. Edison dreamed of his triumphs of electricity long before they were a realization. Suppose that the measures contained in this great rivers and harbors bill were held up to that sort of a test, including $4,000,000 expended upon the Ohio River; how much tonnage would have actually exist upon which to base a safe calculation by a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors when determining as to the merits or demerits of a proposition? If there had to be a mathematical proof of the commercial profit of the great enterprises in which the governments have placed their millions, what would have become of the proposition for the Sault Ste. Marie Where would have been the Suez Canal? Still the unrealized dreams of some philosopher.

Why, the Panama Canal has been a matter of speculation for half a century. Dreamers have written about it, essayists have called attention to the fact that sometime the distant future would demand it, but finally this prosaic Congress is now in the midst of its construction. And what are the arguments presented? Is there any man living that can tell within millions of tons of the probable business to be done by Panama Canal when completed? It is true that generalities are indulged in about our oriental trade, but everybody knows that our oriental trade at present as compared with our European trade is absolutely insignificant. But it takes the dreamer that can see things that are not to be discerned by the eye, that can hear things the sound waves of which do not reach the drum of the ear, that have brought the practical triumph of this United States and all progressive people, which were afterwards turned into brick and mortar and stone.

Now, then, does anyone say that it is an impractical dream to unite the two greatest cities in this country, one having two and one-half millions of people and the other 600,000, by a waterway passing through the heart of a great State at present composed of 6,000,000 of people and already the center of civilization, destined in the future decades to have gathered there a denser population than there is in the most densely populated part of Massachusetts, endowed by nature with a wonderfully fertile soil, inhabited at present by one of the most progressive and prosperous and busy people on the face of the earth, along whose banks are untold wealth of hidden mines of valuable coal, existing, as we know from actual investigation, from Chicago clear down three-quarters of the length of the Illinois

Already there is a development there in the coal industry which has been unparalleled in the history of our State. Is it impractical to give an additional means of transportation when every man who thinks upon the subject of railroad transporta-tion sees that the amount of facilities for the transportation of all products at the present time with the present railroads through the country is short some 25 per cent? When practical men like James J. Hill call attention to that and speak of the development of the rivers and harbors as a way to meet the deficiency, is it an impracticable dream to further improve a line of rivers whose location and availability to-day can be marked on the schedules of railroads which actually go in their vicinity and would come in contact with their competition with the present facilities which they have?

In November last there met at St. Louis the greatest waterway convention that has ever assembled in the United States, composed of 1,200 delegates from fifteen States in the Mississippi Valley, including large delegations particularly from the cities of Chicago, St. Louis, Peoria, and Pekin, Ill., devoted to the cause of the project which we are advocating to-day, and composed of leading men in all the avocations of life whose judgment as to the advisability of this project is far superior, in my opinion, to any body of men separated from competitive life and devoted to technical service under the United States Government as officers of the Army.

The governors of Louisiana, Missouri, Arkansas, and Illinois by their presence evidenced the opinion of the men making up the citizenship of all of those States, a valuable proof of the advisability of this project from a commercial standpoint. These men were there at their own expense and volition without hope of advantage save that which would arise for the common The legislatures of the States of Illinois and Missouri have voiced public sentiment in favor of this enterprise in the last few days. There is no doubt but the people of the Middle West believe in its virtues, and propose to continue in their demand for this improvement until it shall have been accomplished.

On January 23 of the present year, just a few days ago, the Illinois Society of Engineers and Surveyors met in their convention session at my home city of Peoria and addressed a memorial in favor of this measure to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and took issue with the adverse finding of the board of engineers recently made as to its advisability from a commercial standpoint. These men are skilled in their profession and are capable of passing upon the technical features of the work, and have the additional advantage of belonging to civil life and are familiar with its burdens, its necessities, and its problems. I append that memorial to my remarks:

PEORIA, ILL., January 23, 1907.

Hon. Joseph G. Cannon,
Speaker of the House of Representatives, and Members of Congress from Illinois,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIRS: We the undersigned members of the Illinois Society of Engineers and Surveyors in annual session assembled do hereby address the following memorial to you in expression of our deep conviction of the feasibility and practicability and the commerical utility (in comparison to its probable cost) of the proposed improvement of the Illinois River into a commercial waterway having a channel of not less than 14 feet in depth as a connection between the already nearly completed Sanitary and Ship Canal leading from Chicago to Joliet with the Mississippi River at or near St. Louis.

We are fully aware that this subject is at the present time before the House of Representatives for consideration, and we are reliably though not officially informed that the two boards, one of survey and one of investigation, of the United States Government have investigated by survey and inquiry into the question of the feasibility and commercial utility of this project and have made their reports to Congress; that the report of the first board of survey unqualifiedly commends the practicability and feasibility of the plan with an estimate of its cost; that the second board, while admitting the practicability and feasibility of the plan and not taking exception to the estimate of cost, has assumed that such cost was in excess of the value of the improvement to the nation from the standpoint of its commercial utility.

Now, therefore, we as practical men, interested only in the ultimate welfare of the State and nation, believe it to be our duty to express our doubt as to the correctness of the deduction of the latter board when viewed from the broad standpoint of the probabilities of the future as judged from the experience of the past. We firmly believe that statistics showing the amount of traffic now existing, or to immediately seek use of this commercial highway if completed, would not be broad enough to indicate the value of such a work to the State and nation. There is no question of the amount of traffic on the canal. There is no question of commercial success or failure of the work as a business enterprise. It is not such a toil route nor such a business enterprise.

As it appeals to us, the question is What will be the broader effect upon the business and prosperity of all the territory which is subject to its possible use or the possible effect upon the cost of freight as carried from one city to another over this great projecte reach the Gulf, and a source of internal defense created by means of a properly constructed Navy that would be of greater value in case of emergency than many times the same amount of money expended on immense battle ships that could be of no value whatever for our internal defense.

We further represent that we believe such a judgment as is redered by this board, if it had been applied to the construction of the canals and locks at the Sault Ste. Marie, based upon statistics covering only the traffic known at that time, over the proposed route, would have prevented forever the construction of that most wonderful highway of commerce, and that the same argument would have prevented private enterprise from ever constructing any of the great transcontinental railroads, and would doubtless prevail against the construction of the Panama Canal, and would never have permitted England to have expended millions of dollars on the Suez Canal.

Finally, that nothing but the experience of the future and analogy with above cases can absolutely prove what we fully believe to be the fact, namely, that the completion of a 14-foot channel to connect the Lakes at Chicago with the Mississippi River at St. Louis will be not only a justifiable expenditure for the United States from the local standpoint of the State of Illinois, but from the standpoint of the future best welfare of the nation.

Respectfully submitted.

Whereas the reports from Washington advise that the rivers and harbors bill as reported from the Rivers and Harbors Committee under the leadership of Hon. THECOORE E. BURTON, its chairman, while providing for the expenditure of an unprecedentedly large amount of money during the coming two years upon various items of internal improvement of rivers and harbors, does not in any way recognize the Illinois

River as one of those objects which is worthy of the financial aid of the United States toward its permanent improvement as a waterway; and Whereas the State of Illinois has permitted the use of the Illinois River for the purpose of the protection of the health of the great city of Chicago by granting the right to turn a large volume of the waters of Lake Michigan down to the Mississippi River through this valley in the full expectation that this would result in affording a great ship canal for the public use to connect the Great Lakes with the Mississippi River, and in furtherance of this idea an extra expenditure of over $30,000,000 has been made by the city of Chicago in order that the greatest obstacle to such a ship canal might be removed and the first and most expensive section of that great work be completed and offered as a free gift to the United States, and that in pursuance of an act of Congress calling for a survey of the Illinois River and estimate of the cost of its improvement, a board of competent engineers has reported upon the feasibility of the construction of such a waterway at a cost not to exceed $31,000,000; and

As will be seen, the internal-revenue receipts of the General Government for the single year paid at Peoria, III., would be sufficient to pay the total cost of the project from Chicago to

At the present session of Congress the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House, notwithstanding the act of June 13, 1902, did not submit the question of advisability to the War Department or the board of engineers, requested a report from the board of engineers as to the advisability of the project from Chicago to St. Louis, and the essential features of the report of said board of engineers is as follows:

port of said board of engineers is as follows:

4. A 14-foot waterway between Chicago and St. Louis may be considered from two standpoints: First, with respect to its effect on the present and prospective commerce between these two cities, and, second, with respect to its value as a link in a deep waterway extending from the Great Lakes to the Gulf. Considered from the first standpoint, the board is of the opinion that the depth proposed is greater than is necessary for the river traffic that would probably use it, and not sufficiently great to extend lake navigation from the Great Lakes to St. Louis. In the report under consideration the tonnage and draft of the lake vessels visiting Chicago are given in considerable detail, and the opinion is expressed that the great bulk of future lake commerce will probably be carried in vessels of even greater draft and tonnage.

5. The advisability of constructing a 14-foot waterway depends on the probable amount of commerce that would use it, together with its incidental effect on the freight rates of all traffic passing east through St. Louis or south through Chicago. The accompanying report states that during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, the quantity of freight moved by the three roads extending from Chicago to St. Louis was slightly over 1,000,000 tons. From other sources it is learned that the total tonnage in and out of St. Louis is about 39,000,000 tons. The saving that would accrue to the country at large by the construction of a 14-foot waterway is largely conjectural. In the opinion of the board such benefits would not be sufficient to warrant an expenditure by the General Government of $30,000,000.

6. Considering the proposed waterway as a first step toward the construction of a 14-foot waterway from the Great Lakes to the Gulf, it is necessary to anticipate the probable cost of obtaining and the difficulties attending the construction of such a waterway down the Mississippi Valley below St. Louis. The present project for the improvement of the Mississippi River from St. Louis to Cairo contemplates a depth of 8 feet, and it is estimated that to secure it will require an additional expenditure of $20,000,000, with $400,000 annually for maintenance. From Cairo to New Orleans the present project contemplates a depth of 10 feet, and, while a depth of 9 feet has been practically secured, to maintain it calls for an expenditure of approximately $300,000 a year. So far as known no estimate for increasing this depth to 14 feet has ever been made, but it is clear to the board that it would involve enormous expenditure and for a portion of the distance at least the construction of a lateral canal.

7. For these reasons the board believes that the construction of a 14-foot waterway between Chicago and St. Louis is not advisable; but it also believes that the commercial interests of the Great Lakes are entitled to an outlet to the Gulf of Mexico of as great a capacity as can be obtained at reasonable cost. This capacity is now limited by the projected depth between St. Louis and Cairo—that is, 8 feet—a depth that will not only suffice for a large amount of through commerce, but will be sufficient t

It seems to me, as I have already stated, that it is the function of Congress to pass upon the advisability of the Government entering upon an enterprise of this kind, leaving the technical questions, requiring professional skill, for the board of engineers. The people who inhabit the Illinois Valley understand its needs and the possibilities, from a commercial standpoint, of the proposed improvement, whether measured by the advantages of the 14-foot waterway from Chicago to St. Louis or whether the whole scheme of a ship canal from Chicago to the Gulf is considered. I look forward confidently to the day when the business judgment of the people of the entire Mississippi Valley will have been justified by the completion of this great waterway, draining the heart of the continent and carrying upon its bosom the fruits of our industry to the lands of every clime.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. Shep-

PARD] is recognized for forty-five minutes.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit for the consideration of this and future Congresses certain data in reference to Cypress Bayou and Sulphur and Red rivers, all of which penetrate my district.

CYPRESS BAYOU.

The first survey of Cypress Bayou, the chain of lakes and passes, and Twelvemile Bayou, all composing the Jefferson-Shreveport waterway and known generally as "Cypress Bayou," Shreveport waterway and known generally as "Cypress Bayou," was ordered by the rivers and harbors act of July 11, 1870 (U. S. Stat. L., vol. 16, p. 226 et seq.). In January, 1871, Lieut. E. A. Woodruff, Corps of Engineers, proceeded to Jefferson, Tex., to commence the survey, but was prevented by high water. He did not complete the work until over a year later. On April 25, 1872, Lieutenant Woodruff made a report giving the results of the survey. The report began by showing that the lower section of the Jefferson-Shreveport waterway had been improved by the Government as early as 1854 and utilized by Red River boats as a means of passing around the Red River raft above Shreveport. Thereafter the lower section was subjected to the double use of navigation to Jefferson and navigation to points on Red River above Shreveport. At a certain point the boats intended for Red River would return to Red River through a connecting tributary above the raft, while the Jefferson boats would turn westward on the original waterway

The report then stated that its author, Lieutenant Woodruff, had been directed not only to survey the Jefferson-Shreveport waterway, but to examine the advisability of removing the raft in Red River. He said that the raft undoubtedly should be removed, and added the following concerning the effect of the removal on Cypress Bayou:

removal on Cypress Bayou:

The only objection likely to be raised, except that of expense, is the anticipated injury to the lake and bayou navigation to Jefferson, Tex. The people of that city are naturally anxious to secure their present facilities and to improve them. Even if their apprehensions were well grounded they would form an insufficient reason for allowing the ruin caused by the backing up of the water above the raft to spread over the productive valley below Fulton; but it is susceptible of demonstration that the diversion of the water in the lakes caused by opening the main channel of the river must be very gradual and that the injury to navigation may be entirely counteracted by means not too expensive to admit of practical application.

Lieutenant Woodruff concluded his report by outlining a project for dredging and snagging and by making the following specific recommendation:

If it be decided to remove the Red River raft, for building dam at foot of Soda Lake to contract waterway at low stages, $70,000. (See Chief of Engineers' Report, 1872-73, vol. 2, pp. 568-573.)

The rivers and harbors act of June 10, 1872 (U. S. Stat. L., vol. 17, 370-376), made an appropriation of $10,000 for the improvement of Cypress Bayou. Work was begun on December 18, 1872, the city of Jefferson tendering the Government free of charge a large dredge boat, which it had purchased at a cost of $50,000, for use in the bayou. At that time the city of Jefferson was visited by 200 boats a year from Cincinnati, St. Louis, New Orleans, and all other important points of the Mississippi region. The city had spent large sums in improving the stream in addition to the purchase of the dredge. The rivers and harbors act of March 3, 1873 (U. S. Stat. L., vol. 17, 560-565), in further pursuance of Lieutenant Woodruff's report, made the following appropriation:

For the improvement of Cypress Bayou and construction of dams and dredging at the foot of Soda Lake, Texas, $50,000.

Here we have an unqualified recommendation for a dam for $70,000 and a distinct and unqualified appropriation of $50,000 for that purpose and for the purposes of dredging and snagging which had been cared for in the former act of June 10, 1872, and yet no effort was made even to begin a dam.

From that day to this not a single step has been taken to carry out this solemn provision of the law for a dam on this waterway to counteract the injurious effect of the removal of the Red River raft. Captain Wooten, head of the Texas engineering district, who has just made an examination of Cypress Bayou under the last rivers and harbors act, advises me that it is still practicable to construct the dam at the foot of Caddo Lake, and that this, with only a little dredging, will give a navigable depth of at least 6 feet from Mooringsport to Jefferson throughout the year and will cause no increase in the submerged area. Captain Wooten's letter on this subject is as follows:

UNITED STATES ENGINEER OFFICE, FEDERAL BUILDING, Dallas, Tex., November 14, 1996.

Hon. Morris Sheppard, M. C., Texarkana, Tex.

Hon. Morris Sheffard, M. C.,

Texarkana, Tex.

Dear Sir: In response to your verbal request for certain information as to the cost of completely closing Ferry Lake by a weir such as described in my report on a survey of the waterways connecting Jefferson, Tex., and Shreveport, La., I would say that the weir therein mentioned was to be built in connection with a lock. Omitting the lock would increase the length of the weir by the space occupied by the lock and would correspondingly increase the cost. It is probable, though, that a complete weir similar to the one contemplated could be constructed at a cost of about $$85,000.

The weir for which the estimate was submitted was to have its crest at an elevation of 57 meters above the Cairo datum. This elevation would, with only a little dredging, give a navigable depth of at least 6 feet to Jefferson throughout the year and would cause no increase in the submerged area. The height of the dam would vary throughout its length, depending on the depth of the water, but would average between 3 and 4 feet.

Should it be determined later to improve the waterway below and place a lock in the dam, the only increase in cost over my original estimate would be the expense of tearing out the necessary length of the dam. This would not exceed $1,000.

I am not prepared to give a complete answer to your question as to the value of the water power developed, as I have not all the data which I would require on entering into a study of that phase of the matter. The power available would, of course, be subject to fluctuations. It would be a minimum naturally during low-water seasons, and would also be reduced at times of high water in Red River, as the head would at those times be diminished and occasionally wiped out almost entirely. It would seem to me, however, that the power would have a decided value and might possibly be leased for a sufficient sum to materially reduce if not entirely meet the interest charges on the cost of the weir. However, I should require more data and fur

W. P. WOOTEN, Captain, Corps of Engineers.

The foot of Caddo Lake is about a mile below Mooringsport, where the Kansas City Southern Railroad, running from Kansas City, Mo., to Port Arthur, Tex., crosses Caddo Lake. Navigation from Mooringsport to Jefferson will therefore be especially valuable in that it will give Jefferson connection with a competing railroad to the Gulf. The waterway from Jefferson to Mooringsport is now navigable nearly all the year, but it is obstructed by an immense accumulation of snags. Snagging work has been begun on this section under the last rivers and harbors act, and navigation has been resumed on that part of the channel which has been partially cleared. This work has been done since June 30, 1906, and consequently does not figure in the reports for the last fiscal year. This dam was part of a project pronounced feasible by Captain Wooten for the permanent restoration of the entire waterway from Shreveport to Jefferson, but recommended unfavorably by him on account of the cost, which he estimated at $525,000.

Unless this dam is constructed at some time in the not very distant future the falls, which are now working through the bed of Soda Lake and are now within a few miles of Caddo Lake, will within the next five years, perhaps, reach the foot of Caddo Lake and impair the present water level and decrease the depth from Mooringsport to Jefferson. Furthermore, when the falls shall have reached the foot of Caddo Lake they will have excavated a channel from Twelvemile Bayou to that point, the immediate dredging of which forms the most expensive and prominent feature of Captain Wooten's recent plan. Then it would require but the addition of a lock for the permanent restoration of the entire waterway from Shreveport to Jefferson and the cost would be reduced by almost two-thirds. Bear in mind, however, that the entire waterway is at present navigable in high-water seasons every year and that these seasons continue from three to six months almost every year. There has been no navigation, on account of the prevalence of stumps and snags, during the last decade. Assistant Engineer Walter H. Polk, who made the examination under the recent rivers and harbors act, recommends in his report of August 28, 1905, that the channel be cleared of snags and other obstructions and that the channel through the stumpy part of Soda

Lake be outlined by signs.

On May 15, 1873, a project of snagging, clearing, and dredging was outlined, and the work continued in accordance therewith. Some time after this and before October, 1873, Lieutenant Wood-ruff made another examination, and in his report recommended a lock and dam at Albany Point, and stated that this was absolutely necessary to prevent the gradual deterioration of navigation to Jefferson after the removal of the raft. At this time the raft was in process of removal. Captain Howell, head of the New Orleans district, which then included Cypress Bayou, ordered a further investigation, which was made early in 1874 by Asst. Engineer H. A. Leavitt, Lieutenant Woodruff having died. On the basis of Mr. Leavitt's examination and report, Captain Howell reported on October 5, 1874, suggesting a dam across the foot of Soda Lake and a cut thence to Red River as a means not only of preserving navigation to Jefferson, but of making the lake a reservoir for impounding the flood waters of Red River and thus lengthening the season of navigation on He estimated the cost at $372,580. He made this recommendation on the condition that the entire amount be appropriated at once, and that the commerce would be found to justify the expenditure. On the latter point he expressed no opinion. He made estimates for continuing the snagging and clearing work. At that time $35,873.96 had been expended in this form of improvement. Snagging, dredging, and straightening operations were continued during the following year, the balance on July 1, 1875, being $4,259, $20,166.36 having been expended during the fiscal year ending on that day. In reviewing the work of the previous year, Captain Benyaurd, who had succeeded Captain Howell, stated that the construction of the dam had not been begun because the amount of the appropriation was insufficient. This is certainly a remarkable statement. If at the present time there should be recommended a certain project at a total cost of $70,000 and an initial appropriation of $50,000 should be obtained, it would be considered quite an achievement. Captain Benyaurd, in this same report, announced that the raft in Red River had been removed, and that the removal had seriously affected the interests of Jefferson through the impairment of Cypress Bayou navigation.

During the fiscal year ending July 1, 1876, $4,237.58 was expended in dredging and snagging. The rivers and harbors act of August 14, 1876, carried an appropriation of $13,000 for continuing the work of dredging and removing obstructions in Cypress Bayou, Texas. (19 Stat. L., 132–139.) During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, $3,121.37 was expended under the old project of dredging and snagging. The Texas and Pacific Railroad had been constructed to Jefferson, diverting a large part of Jefferson's trade from New Orleans to St. Louis, and Captain Benyaurd, in his report of July 2, 1877, stated that there was great competition between the steamboats and the railroads, showing the actual saving resulting to the people from navigation. He stated that when navigation was closed the railroad rate per bale of cotton from Jefferson to St. Louis was $4; when open, $3; that when navigation was closed the railroad rate per bale from Jefferson to New Orleans was $4; when open, $2.50. By steamboat from Jefferson to New Orleans it was $1.50 to $2 per bale. He further showed that the railroad rate from St. Louis to Texarkana, where there was no navigation, a distance of 480 miles, was $105 per carload; from St. Louis to Jefferson, where there was navigation, a distance of 551 miles, $75 per carload. He also stated that the citizens of Jefferson had expended over $60,000 altogether in the improvement of Cypress Bayou.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, $9,854.32 had been expended mainly in the construction of a new dredge, the old dredge having sunk. The act of June, 1878 (U. S. Stat. L., vol. 20, 152-163), contained an appropriation of $15,000 for improving Cypress Bayou, and the act of March 3, 1879 (Ib., 363-377), made an appropriation of $6,000 for the same purpose. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, the amount expended in completing the dredge, in snagging, etc., was $13,872.70, the total cost of the dredge being $20,000. The dredge was put in commission January 20, 1879. During the fiscal year ending June 1880, the amount expended in snagging and dredging was In June, 1879, the dredge boat built expressly for $2,824,67. Cypress Bayou at a cost of $20,000, that amount being charged to Cypress Bayou, was taken to the mouth of Red River and put at work there. In January, 1880, it was taken to Shreveport to be returned thence to the mouth of Red River in June. The Chief of Engineers, in his annual report of October 16, 1880, briefly reviewing the entire work since 1872, says:

In many instances the work had been so imperfectly done, leaving projecting stumps, as to make navigation exceedingly dangerous.

Let me add that thousands of these projecting stumps may be seen along the waterway to-day. In view of the statement just quoted one would naturally wonder why the dredge was removed to Red River. The officer in charge, Captain Benyaurd, in his report of July 1, 1880, stated that up to that time the citizens of Jefferson had spent over $70,000 on the waterway; that when navigation was open flour could be obtained in Jefferson at $10 to $12 per barrel, when closed the cost was $25 per barrel. Let it be observed here that at this time Jefferson had had for several years the railroads she has to-day; that there were open and closed seasons of navigation then as there are to-day. Before the raft was removed there was navigation all the year round. The raft had been completely removed in 1875. In 1880, five years afterwards, the effect of the removal had fully developed and there were certain low-water seasons then, as there are to-day, when a child could cross the flats. It is the accumulation of snags and stumps during the last ten or twelve years that has obliterated navigation to-day and not the railroads or the condition of the flats in extreme low water.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, the amount charged to Cypress Bayou was $1,549.04, although not a cent was expended on Cypress Bayou. Throughout this fiscal year the Cypress Bayou dredge was kept at work in Red River and "no actual work of improvement was carried on in Cypress Bayou," to quote the exact language of Major, formerly Captain, Benyaurd in his report of July 27, 1881.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, no work was done on the bayou, although $225.22 was charged thereto. The dredge belonging to Cypress Bayou was still kept in Red River. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, no work was done, although $845.78 was charged to Cypress Bayou and the dredge belonging to Cypress Bayou was still kept in Red River. In his report for that fiscal year the officer in charge stated that Jefferson received during the year 100,000 bales of cotton, half of which had been shipped to New Orleans by water, and the figures presented showed that Jefferson's trade had been increasing since 1880. The truth is that the combined advantages of railroad and water transportation increased Jefferson's trade and improved her rate situation.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, $932.31 was expended on Cypress Bayou, and the Chief of Engineers in his annual report of October 15, 1884, made the following state-

The first project for the improvement of Cypress Bayou consisted in cutting and dredging a channel through the lake and bayou, thus affording a good high-water channel from Jefferson, Tex. to Shreveport, La. This work was completed in 1880, but since then the timber has grown up again, and for the purpose of removing it the U.S. S. Thomas B. Florence made one trip to Jefferson, Tex., doing as much work as the high stage of water would permit.

Evidently this work of the Florence was unsatisfactory. The officer in charge, Major Miller, in his report for that fiscal year said of this trip of the Florence that-

On account of high water but little could be accomplished, only 149 leaning trees being cut down.

Nothing was said concerning the Cypress Bayou dredge. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, $775.34 was expended, and the Cypress Bayou dredge was still kept in Red

The rivers and harbors act of July 5, 1884 (U. S. Stat. L., vol. 23, 133-151), directed a resurvey to ascertain if permanent improvement of the stream could not be made in some other way than by a dam across Albany flats. An examination was made and report submitted recommending that the improvement be confined to straightening and marking the present channel, cutting stumps therefrom, and reopening the cuts by dredging, and stating that this would secure navigation to Jefferson for seven or eight months in the year. The cost of the project submitted was $13,000. This report sustains my contention that dredging and snagging operations will reopen navigation for a considerable part of the year. In 1885 the raft had been removed for over ten years and the condition of the waterway was practically what it is to-day. This report states that dredging was necessary. And yet the dredge which had been built six years before for the express purpose of being used in Cypress Bayou, which had been built at a cost of $20,000 and the money taken out of a Cypress Bayou appropriation, had been kept in Red River during practically all of the six years.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, $31.15 was expended, and the Cypress Bayou dredge was still kept in Red River. The rivers and harbors act of August 5, 1886 (U. S. Stat. L., vol. 24, 310-335), contained an appropriation of $18,000 for "improving Cypress Bayou and the lakes between Jefferson, Tex., and Shreveport, La." During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, $5,606.39 was expended, and the report of the Chief of Engineers of October 22, 1887, as well as the report of the officer in charge, Captain Willard, show that this amount, as well as nearly all the rest of the $18,000 appropriated August 5, 1886, had been and would be used in rehabilitating the Cypress Bayou dredge, which was still in Red River, and which now had to be rebuilt at the expense of Cypress Bayou money. Thus we see that this Cypress Bayou dredge, built at an original cost of $20,000, this amount being taken out of Cypress Bayou money, had been used almost all its life in Red River and practically worn out there, and that it was now rebuilt at an expense of nearly $18,000, this amount being also taken out of Cypress Bayou money. Thus Cypress Bayou was deprived of the use Bayou money. and benefit of by far the larger part of the appropriations of June, 1878, and March 3, 1879—that is, of an amount approximating $20,000.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, $12,393.61 was expended in dredging, etc. The rebuilding of the dredge had been begun in April, 1887. It was completed in July, 1887, and by far the larger part of the amount expended during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, was used in completing the dredge. In July, 1887, the dredge was towed from Shreveport to Jefferson, where the cabin was completed and the machinery fitted. The work was finished August 15, 1887, and was used for dredging work in Cypress Bayou until May, 1888. the dredge had been rebuilt by so large an expenditure of Cypress Bayou funds, this was the only dredging ever done on the Cypress Bayou waterway by the rehabilitated dredge, with the exception of about three months in the year 1889-90. In his report for this fiscal year Captain Willard, the officer in charge, strove partially to remedy this injustice by recommending that $7,500 be allotted to Cypress Bayou from Red River funds. (See House Ex. Docs., 2d sess. 50th Cong., 1888–89,

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, $338.29 was ex pended; also there was expended $1,755.45 of an appropriation of $5,000 by the rivers and harbors act of August 11, 1888 (U. S. Stat. L., vol. 25, 400-433), under the following item:

Improving Red River, Louisiana and Arkansas: Continuing improvement from Fulton, Ark., to Atchafalaya, including completing the work at Alexandria, $65,000, of which $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be used upon Cypress Bayou and the lakes between Shreveport, La., and Jefferson, Tex.

The money expended during this fiscal year was for removing The money expended during this iscal year was for removing stumps and a small amount of dredging. The dredging and snagging were not done by the Cypress Bayou dredge, which had again been removed to Red River, but by the Red River snag boat Howell. The report of the officer in charge, Captain Willard, showed that the work of the fiscal year, which improved the channel from Jefferson to Mooringsport, had resulted in an immediate reduction of about 60 per cent in competing railroad rates. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1890, $2,918.73 was expended in dredging, removing stumps, etc., the Cypress Bayou dredge, as well as the snag boat Howell, being employed from December, 1889, to March 6, 1890. The dredge was then again taken back to Shreveport.

On February 9, 1890, a resolution passed Congress calling on the Secretary of War for submission of plans for restoring per-manent all-year navigation between Jefferson and Shreveport. The matter was referred to Captain Willard, the officer in charge, who recommended that a survey be ordered for a dam at the head of Soda Lake and for dredging through Soda Lake to Twelvemile Bayou and Red River. This is almost the same plan suggested by Captain Wooten in his last report. Pending the completion of the survey, Captain Willard recommended that snagging and dredging continue, and asked for $15,000 for these

The act of September 19, 1890 (U. S. Stat. L., vol. 26, 426-465) appropriated $10,000 for the survey recommended above. No appropriation was made for dredging and snagging and no work of this kind was done in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891. On the survey $9,897.99 was expended and $2,000 asked with which to complete it. In his report of June 30, 1891, Captain Willard, the officer in charge, merely reported progress on the survey and asked for $5,000 for snagging and clearing, in addition to the amount asked for the completion of the survey using this language:

Even if boats should not run between Jefferson and Shreveport on regular trips, the knowledge that there is a navigable channel for small boats at medium stages will be sufficient to keep railroad freight charges within reasonable limits, and thus benefit the people for whom Jefferson is the market and distributing point. (House Ex. Docs. 1st sess. 52d Cong., 1891-92, vol. 6, 1956.)

This statement exactly fits the situation to-day. fiscal year ending June 30, 1892, $96 was expended and the dredge still kept in Red River, despite the reports of the past two years recommending snagging and dredging work.

The rivers and harbors act of July 13, 1892 (U. S. Stat. L., vol. 27, 88-116), contained an appropriation of $5,000 for Cypress Bayou, as a part of the Red River appropriation, to be used for cleaning and dredging, and $2,000 was provided by an independent Cypress Bayou clause for completing the survey.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, $1,930.34 was expended in completing the survey. Of the $5,000 appropriated July 13, 1892, for cleaning and dredging, not a cent was expended and the Cypress Bayou dredge remained in Red River. engineer in charge of the survey, H. M. Marshall, submitted his report, which proposed a plan for a dam with waste weir across Soda Lake and a connection with Red River through Cotton-wood Bayou by a lock with double gates at an estimated cost of $375,000. In submitting this report, the Chief of Engineers in his report of September 19, 1893, said:

In view of the limited amount of commerce to be benefited, the cost of operating and maintaining, and the fact that the probable life of the improvement can not be estimated, it is doubtful whether the work should be undertaken.

In submitting Captain Marshall's survey and report, Captain Willard, the district officer, said:

Considering the needs of Jefferson alone, I should recommend improving the present bayou channel from Jefferson to the head of Twelvemile Bayou by removing the logs and cypress stumps, widening it by dredging, easing the curves, clearing the banks of the bayou of leaning timber, and marking the channel by clusters of piles, beacons, and

It will be observed that while lock and dam projects for permanent all-year navigation were never entered upon, projects for dredging, snagging, and cleaning, in order to preserve the six to eight months' navigation which always existed, were always recommended.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, $1,682.83 was expended in removing stumps, etc., but there was no dredging. The rivers and harbors act of August 17, 1894 (U. S. Stat. L., vol. 28, 338–372), appropriated $10,000 for dredging and removing obstructions and straightening channel between Jefferson, Tex., and Shreveport, La. Captain Willard, the officer in charge, in his report of July 30, 1895, stated that no dredging had been done during the previous fiscal year for the reason that the Cypress Bayou dredge was now illsuited to the work, and that he had some time before recommended the construc-tion of a new dredge; that this new dredge had been authorized to be purchased on June 18, 1895, and that it was the intention to use it on Cypress Bayou as soon as practicable. Thus the rehabilitated dredge, which had been built with Cypress Bayou funds at a cost of nearly $18,000, had been practically worn out in Red River, and Cypress Bayou deprived of by far the larger part of the moneys expended in its construction. Let it be said further that of the $5,000 appropriated July 30, 1892, for Cypress Bayou, the item of $1,682.83 expended in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, was the only portion ever used for Cypress Bayou. Thus less than $6,000 of Red River appropriations were used on Cypress Bayou, while two splendid dredges built out of Cypress Bayou funds and intended for Cypress Bayou, costing approximately $38,000, were practically worn out in Red River.

To be specific, the first dredge was completed at a cost of $20,000 of Cypress Bayou funds on January 20, 1879. It was used on Cypress Bayou for five months and taken to Red River in June, 1879, where it was used until 1887, and was by that time practically worn out. In other words, it was used five months in Cypress Bayou and nearly eight years in Red River. Let me here refer again to the fact that during the fiscal years ending June 30, 1881, and June 30, 1882, $1,549.04 and $225.22, respectively, were charged to Cypress Bayou, although no work was done thereon, and that in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, $932.31 was expended on Cypress Bayou, with the result that only 149 leaning trees were cut down. The dredge was rebuilt in 1887 at a total cost of about $18,000 of Cypress Bayou It was finished on August 15, 1887, and used on the bayou until May, 1888, and later from December, 1889, to March, 1890, or about a year altogether. During the remainder of its life it was used in Red River, and in July, 1895, pronounced unfit for work on Cypress Bayou. Thus it was used about a year on Cypress Bayou and about eight years on Red River. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, there was no expenditure on the bayou. The dredge ordered for Cypress Bayou on June 18, 1895, came from the Government's Mississippi fleet at Vicksburg and was simply transferred.

The rivers and harbors act of June 3, 1896 (U. S. Stat. L., vol. 29, 202-244), appropriated $5,000 for continuing improvements on Cypress Bayou, Texas. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, only 82 cents was expended on Cypress Bayou. The Chief of Engineers, in his report of September 29, 1896, stated that the 1894 appropriation of $10,000 and the 1895 appropriation of $5,000 had not yet been expended because there was no plant available and the cost of towing a dredge long distances to and from the work rendered the contract ihexpedient with the limited amount available, and that as soon as practicable it was intended to transfer the dredge brought from the Mississippi to this work; that no snagging or cleaning of any consequence had been done since 1892 and no dredging He did not state what had become of the Cypress since 1888. Bayou dredge, nor does it figure in any of the subsequent re-ports. He added that the commerce in the bayou had become insignificant, but "that the maintenance of the water route would act more as a check on freight rates than as a means of transportation." He did not state the real reason for the dwindling of commerce on the bayou, the lack of cleaning and dredging for many years and the consequent accumulation of snags and other obstructions.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, $619.17 was charged to Cypress Bayou, but not a cent was expended thereon, although on June 24, 1896, Major Willard, the engineer in charge, submitted a definite project for the expenditure of the amounts appropriated in 1895 and 1896 in snagging and cleaning operations, a project which was finally approved by the Chief of Engineers. (H. Docs., vol 5, 55th Cong., 2d sess., 1892.) In his report of July 1, 1897, Major Willard stated that it was still intended to bring over the Mississippi dredge; that it had left Vicksburg on June 25, 1897, and on June 30 was near Colfax, La., on Red River.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, $3,525.57 was charged to Cypress Bayou, but not a cent expended thereon. The Chief of Engineers in his annual report of September 29, 1898, stated that the Mississippi dredge reached Shreveport July 5, 1897, but during the ensuing twelve months there was no stage of water high enough for the dredge to cross Albany Flats; that with the single exception of the fiscal year 1894-95 this was the first twelve months in the twenty-six years during which there had been gauge readings at Shreveport without a rise sufficient to put the dredge across the flats.

In January, 1898, he says, after a rise had set in and there was reasonable probability of getting the dredge across the flats a small United States snag boat, the Columbia, was added to the plant at Shreveport as a tender for the dredge and that since then necessary repairs and alterations of the boats were made and they were not taken over during the rise. Why he waited six months before making necessary repairs and alterations on the dredge does not appear. He repeated what had been said in a former report about the smallness of commerce on the stream and added that its maintenance would mean more as a check on freight rates than as a means of transportation. He attempted no explanation for not taking the dredge to Jefferson in January, 1898, when the rise first appeared, and making the repairs The overseer in charge of the dredge and snag boat went over the Cypress Bayou route in a skiff in February, 1898, and said that if the dredge were at Jefferson it could do good work between Jefferson and Mooringsport, or on Cypress Bayou and The fact is that if the Cypress Bayou dredge Caddo Lake. boats of 1879 and 1887 had been kept at Jefferson they could have operated constantly over a greater part of the waterway over all that part above Albany Flats.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, $3,577.92 was expended, a party equipped with tools, tackle, and explosives working over the route from August to November, 1899. The dredge was still kept at Shreveport, the Chief of Engineers stating in his annual report of September 28, 1899, that at no time during the preceding two years had the water been sufficiently high for the dredge to cross the flats. Evidently a considerable part of the amount expended during this fiscal year was charged to the maintenance of the dredge at Shreveport. The report of the officer in charge for this fiscal year, Major Willard, stated that the highest reading of the Shreveport gauge was 15.6 feet on January 24, 1899. My own observations, made on a skiff trip from Mooringsport to Shreveport on July 6, 1905, show that there must have been an ample depth at that time to permit the dredge to cross the flats—that is, there must have been a suffi-cient depth on January 24, 1899, when the Shreveport gauge read 15.6 feet. When I made the above trip, the Shreveport gauge showed 20.7, and there was nearly 7 feet of depth over the shallowest portion of the flats.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, $843.30 was charged to Cypress Bayou, but not a cent was expended on it, this amount being used for the maintenance of the dredge at Shreveport. The Chief of Engineers stated in his annual report of September 28, 1900, that in the last three years the dredge could at no time get across the flats. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, $885.60 was charged to Cypress Bayou, but no work was done thereon. Evidently this amount was used for maintaining the dredge at Shreveport. The Chief of Engineers stated in his annual report of October 1, 1901, that during the last four years the water had never been sufficiently high for the dredge to be taken across the flats. The district officer, Major Casey, stated that the highest reading of the gauge at Shreveport was 16.4 feet on June 7, 1901. At this time both the district officer and the Chief of Engineers made the remarkable discovery that dredging would be of no use to navigation. If this were so, it was certainly very wrong to charge the bayou with the maintenance of the dredge.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, \$933.10 was charged to Cypress Bayou, but not a cent was expended thereon, this amount being used for the care of the dredge at Shreveport. The district officer stated that at no time during this year could the dredge be taken across the flats, the highest reading of the gauge at Shreveport being 17.6 June 13-18, 1902. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, \$1,236.10 was charged to Cypress Bayou, but no work was done thereon, the amount being used for the keep of the dredge. This time the district officer said that it was impracticable to take the dredge to Cypress Bayou and return it to Red River after expending available funds, and added that at but one time in six years could the dredge have crossed the flats. It is certainly remarkable that after twenty-six successive years, in each of which, with one exception, the dredge could have crossed the flats, have followed six consecutive years in which, with the exception of one period, it could not do so. Either this Mississippi dredge drew more water than it should have done to work on Cypress Bayou, or the engineers were mistaken when they said that the boat could not be towed across the flats. From my own personal observation and knowledge, I affirm that when the Shreveport gauge is at 15 a boat drawing 2, $2\frac{1}{2}$, and (when there is a head rise also) even 3 feet can cross the flats. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, no work was done nor was anything done during the fiscal years ending June 30, 1905, and

The rivers and harbors act of June 13, 1902, authorized a preliminary examination of the old plan for a dam at Albany Flats and a ditch to Red River. The report was made on December 1, 1902, and was, of course, unfavorable. The construction of levees along Red River had made such a plan utterly impracticable. The rivers and harbors act of March 3, 1905, directed a resurvey, with an examination of the falls at Little Pass. The report was made on December 23, 1905, and outlined a plan by which permanent navigation might be obtained through the erection of a lock and dam at the foot of Caddo Lake and the dredging of a channel thence through Soda Lake to Twelvemile Bayou, the cost being estimated at $525,000. The recommendation was unfavorable on account of the engineer's belief that the commercial returns would not justify the expenditure. Captain Wooten's report showed that during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905, despite the twelve or fifteen years that had elapsed since any effective snagging and cleaning work had been done on the bayou, two boats engaged in the river trade carried a freight of 5,897 tons, value $32,320. Asst. Engineer W. H. Polk, who did the actual work of the survey ordered by the act of 1905, recommended that the channel be cleared of snags and other obstructions and marked by signs through the stumpy part of Soda Lake.

June 30, 1906, respectively.

In endeavoring to show the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors that Captain Wooten's plan should be favorably recommended, Senator Culberson and I presented data showing that the tonnage of eleven counties in Texas within a radius of less than 100 miles of Jefferson amounted in the year 1905 to over one billion and a half pounds of freight, and that a reduction of only 10 per cent in the freight rate on this amount would be a saving every year of over twice the amount estimated by Captain Wooten to be the cost of the proposed improvement. We showed that if Jefferson could get the rate from New York to Houston and Beaumont the average saving in less than carload lots would be 65 per cent, and in carload lots 36 per cent. We showed that by adding the Texas commission mileage rates from Jefferson to points in the eleven counties within a radius of less than 100 miles of Jefferson the average saving would be from 16 to 26 per cent on carload lots and from 30 to 48 per cent on less than carload lots. We presented comparative rates from New York, St. Louis, Kansas City, and New Orleans to Shreveport, La., the eastern terminus of the Jefferson-Shreveport waterway, and a water point, and to Jefferson, which is not now considered a water point, showing a difference of from 50 to 200 per cent on carload lots against Jefferson. In addition we presented an unqualified statement from Hon. O. B. Colquitt, one of the Texas railroad commissioners, to the effect that if navigation could be restored to Jefferson the Texas railroad commission would use Jefferson as a water-basing point and that all north Texas rates would be reduced from 10 to 331 per cent. Commissioner Colquitt placed the saving which would result to north and northeast Texas from the restoration of navigation to Jefferson as easily equaling one-half million dollars per annum. It will perhaps be best to give here Railroad Commissioner Colquitt's exact statement regarding Cypress Bayou

Texas Railroad Commission,
Austin, Tex., March 19, 1906.

Hon. Morris Sheppard, M. C., Washington, D. C.

Dear Sir: Replying to your letter of March 15, beg to advise that the Texas and Pacific Railway, at my request, furnished the following statement showing amount of business done by that line from and to stations from Texarkana to Mineola; also on the year ending December 31, 1906:

From Texarkana to Mineola, inclusive: Inbound freight
Outbound freight
Transcontinental Junction to Paris, inclusive:
Inbound freight
Outbound freight 165, 667, 40 176, 741, 00

1, 211, 769, 95

I assume that with the navigation of Cypress Bayou up to Jefferson that the same rates would apply to Jefferson that now apply to Shreveport, La. Estimating the benefits accordingly, I think that 20 per cent of the freight charges between the points named above would be saved to the shippers, or a sum approximating $250,000 per annum would be saved to the people of that section of Texas. With navigation up to Jefferson I am of the opinion that the traffic passing through that place and on the stations between those named on the Texas and Pacific would increase 20 per cent over the amount given in the figures above. I have not heard from the auditor of the Cotton Belt road, but think it safe to say that with the navigation of Cypress Bayou up to Jefferson, and with water rates applying to that point, the rates prescribed by the Texas rates would be reduced from 10 to 33½ per cent on those which now apply. The saving, in my humble judgment, would easily equal one-half million per annum to the freight payers of north and northeast Texas.

I can not urge upon you and the other Representatives in Congress northeast Texas.

I can not urge upon you and the other Representatives in Congress too strongly the need of water competition within our borders.

I had intended making up a statement showing the number of bales of cotton produced in this radius, but the figures which the Texas and Pacific has furnished me include the earnings of that line on cotton shipments as well as other classes of freight.

If there is anything further you think of I can do to assist in securing the appropriation for Cypress Bayou, let me know.

Yours, very truly,

O. B. COLQUITT, Commissioner.

Despite this showing the Board of Engineers concurred in the unfavorable conclusion of Captain Wooten with reference to the dam, etc. Thus this lock and dam project was rejected, as have been all former lock and dam projects submitted in connection with this waterway. It appears from the reports of Captain Wooten and the Board of Engineers that the waterway is still navigable from Shreveport to Jefferson during high-water seasons, and that it is navigable during nearly all the year from Jefferson to Mooringsport. The rivers and harbors act of March 3, 1905, besides directing the resurvey, provided that the balance remaining from the appropriations of 1895 and 1896, which had been devoted almost entirely to the mainte-nance of the dredge at Shreveport, the balance being $3,556.16, should be expended in snagging operations on Cypress Bayou, between Mooringsport and Jefferson. Thus from the rivers and harbors act of June 10, 1872, which appropriated $10,000 for snagging and cleaning operations, to the act of March 3, 1905, the project of snagging, removing obstructions, etc., has been recognized and upheld. The work of expending this balance began in September of this year and has hardly yet been con-

On September 17 of this year a large Red River quarter boat, 70 feet long, 16 feet wide, and drawing about a foot, passed over the flats and rapids at one of the lowest water seasons of the year to begin the work between Mooringsport and Jefferson. I was on the boat as it passed over the rapids, com-monly known as the "falls," and flats. As this work began since the close of the last fiscal year nothing is said concerning it in the current engineers' reports which apply solely to that year. Although the resurvey was distinctly directed without any relation or reference to this unexpended balance, which was appropriated exclusively for snagging work, the engineers charged the expense of this resurvey to this balance. The cost of the resurvey was $613.05. I accompanied Assistant Engineer Polk when he made the resurvey, camping out in all sorts of weather, and acted as recorder in order to cut down the expense as much as I possibly could by lending my own efforts. I understand that the dredge at Shreveport was sold several years ago. The proceeds, whatever they were, have not been credited to Cypress Bayou.

Since the work between Jefferson and Mooringsport began in September excellent results have appeared. The channel through Caddo Lake has been partially cleared, and Mr. F. L. Mundy, who has a sawmill on the lake about 10 miles above Mooringsport, has already put on a boat and barge and has commenced shipping lumber over this channel to Mooringsport. He expects to ship Immer over this channel to adorningsport. The expects to saperal millions of feet next year, besides shingles, telephone poles, etc., and if the work is continued and the river cleared to Jefferson he intends to put on another regular boat between Jefferson and Mooringsport. The clearing of the channel between Jefferson and Mooringsport will give Jefferson connection to the transfer of the Company Polland which prospect Code. with the Kansas City Southern Railroad, which crosses Caddo Lake at Mooringsport, and it will thus have connection with a competing railroad to the Gulf of Mexico. The town of Atlanta, Tex., about 30 miles above Jefferson on the Texas and Pacific, which also runs through Jefferson, has built a railrache, which also runs through Jenerson, has built a rairroad of its own in order to get connection with the Kansas City Southern at Bloomburg, Tex., about 30 miles above Mooringsport, at a cost of over $80,000, and the saving effected on freight rates by this connection with a competing railroad to the Gulf equals every year the original cost of the connecting railroad. As no snagging or clearing work of any consequence has been done on Cypress Bayou in twelve or fifteen years, it is not surprising that there has been an accumulation of snags, timber, obstructions, etc.

By way of summary it may be said that while the various lock and dam projects since the law of March 3, 1873, providing for the construction of dams, which law was never carried out, have been reported unfavorably, still the projects for snagging, dredging, and clearing operations have been recognized and upheld from the act of June 28, 1872, to the recent act of March The effect of the removal of the raft had fully developed by 1880, and the two railroads which run through Jefferson to-day were in full operation in that year. Yet in 1883, of the 100,000 bales of cotton received at Jefferson, over half were shipped to New Orleans by water, and Jefferson's trade had begun to show an increase. Since the removal of the raft there have been open and closed seasons of navigation, and the condition of the stream to-day is physically what it was in 1880, with the exception of an enormous accumulation of snags. Commerce gradually disappeared from the stream after 1885 on account of the removal of the dredges intended for Cypress Bayou to Red River and the persistent neglect of snagging and dredging operations authorized in various laws. We find that the people of Jefferson had in 1880 expended over $70,000 on the waterway.

Let me add here that when the waterway was sufficiently cleared of obstructions to permit navigation during the open seasons railroad rates immediately would go down. The statement of Captain Willard in his report of June 30, 1891, is applicable to-day:

Even if boats should not run between Jefferson and Shreveport on regular trips the knowledge that there is a navigable channel for small boats at medium stages will be sufficient to keep railroad freight charges within reasonable limit and thus benefit the people for whom Jefferson is the market and distributing point.

In addition we have the statement of Railroad Commissioner Colquitt to the effect that when navigation is restored Jefferson will be made the water basing point for an immense section of populous and productive territory.

In further review of the entire subject it may be said that not only was the greater part of the work on Cypress Bayou inefficiently done, but also large portions of appropriations specifically made for Cypress Bayou and sums charged to Cypress Bayou work have been diverted to other purposes. The Chief of Engineers in his annual report of October 16, said, after reviewing the entire work since 1872, on which about $75,000 had been expended and which represents the longest period of continuous work ever done on the bayou, that-

In many instances the work had been so imperfectly done, leaving projecting stumps, as to make navigation exceedingly dangerous.

In his report of October 15, 1884, the Chief of Engineers stated that the timber had grown up again. In the fiscal years ending 1881, 1882, and 1883 no work had been done, and the only work done in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, was one trip of the steamer Florence, with the result that only 149 leaning trees were cut down, and this at an expense of nearly $1,000. During the twenty-two years from 1884 to 1906 the only years in which snagging and clearing work of any extent was done were 1885 (fiscal), 1889, 1890, 1894, and 1899, the amount expended in these five years being less than $11,000. The only dredging from 1884 to 1906 was done in 1887-88 and in 1889-90. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, $1,549.04 was charged to Cypress Bayou, but no work was done thereon. In the following fiscal year $225.22 was similarly charged and no work was done. In the following fiscal year, 1883, no work was done, although $845.78 was charged to Cypress Bayou. Of the $5,000 appropriated July 30, 1892, for Cypress Bayou, the sum of $1,682.83 was expended in the fiscal year of 1894, and was the only portion of this appropriation ever used for Cypress Bayou. There is a just credit, therefore, from this appropriation of $3,317.17 in favor of Cypress Bayou. The dredge which was built at a cost of $20,000 of Cypress Bayou funds on January 20, 1879, was used on Cypress Bayou for but five months and taken to Red River in June, 1879, where it was used until 1887 and practically worn out. This dredge was rebuilt in 1887 at a total cost of $18,000 of Cypress Bayou money.

During 1887-88 and 1889-90 it was used for about twelve months altogether on Cypress Bayou and was then taken to Red River and used until July, 1895, when it was pronounced unfit for work on Cypress Bayou. Certainly of the $38,000 expended for these dredges Cypress Bayou is entitled to a credit of at least $33,000. The rivers and harbors act of August 17, 1894, appropriated $10,000 for dredging and removing obstructions and straightening channel between Jefferson, Tex., and Shreveport, La., and the rivers and harbors act of June 3, 1896, appropriated $5,000 for continuing improvements on Cypress Bayou, About a year later a project for the expenditure of these appropriations in snagging and cleaning operations was outlined and approved. We have seen that a dredge was brought from Vicksburg to Shreveport in 1897, but that it never entered the Jefferson-Shreveport waterway. The greater part of the appro-Jefferson-Shreveport waterway. The greater part of the appropriations of 1894 and 1896 was used for the maintenance of this dredge at Shreveport and only in 1899 were snagging operations undertaken. The unexpended balance of these appropriations on June 30, 1905, was $3,556.16. Thus $9,443.84 had been expended out of appropriations expressly made for Cypress Bayou, almost all of which was used to maintain the dredge at Shreve-

The project contemplated snagging as well as dredging operations. Conceding that it was proper to use part of the funds for the reasonable maintenance of the dredge boat for a reasonable time, and conceding that the small party which made a snagging trip over the route in 1899 expended $3,000, Cypress Bayou is certainly entitled to a credit of at least $2,500 from these appropriations made originally for its exclusive benefit. If the dredge boat could have been gotten across the flats, which I assert could have been done during almost any year from 1897 to 1905, Cypress Bayou is entitled to reimbursement in a much larger sum. Finally, I submit that it was an injustice to take the cost of the last resurvey, which was $613.05, out of the amount of the unexpended balance appropriated for snagging work by the act of 1905. I submit altogether that Cypress Bayou is entitled to a credit on account on these items of over $42,000.

In view of the fact that the little work done since September had already shown the beginnings of a revival of commerce and in view of the facts and arguments herein submitted, I requested an appropriation of $20,000 for the continuing improvement of Cypress Bayou through snagging, cleaning, removing obstructions, etc., and that an examination be directed as to the advisability of constructing a dam at the foot of Caddo Lake. I asked for this appropriation in pursuance of a project which had been recommended and upheld since the Government first took notice of the stream and which was recognized through the appropriation of the unexpended balance in the act of 1905. It will be observed that I requested less than half of the amount heretofore appropriated for Cypress Bayou but diverted to other purposes. I feel the deepest and most consuming interest in Cypress Bayou, and I asked only a small part of what I deemed to be the merest justice.

My predecessors, Representatives John C. Connor, W. P. McLean, David B. Culberson, John W. Cranford, and John L. Sheppard, my father, were all profoundly concerned with this question, and the last public act of my father, on the day before he was fatally stricken, was a long interview with Congressman Burron, the distinguished chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, during which interview he pressed the many arguments in behalf of Cypress Bayou with the most intense earnestness. Since the beginning of my service I have devoted more time and study to this proposition than to any other, having personally inspected every foot of the waterway from Shreveport to Jefferson. I am confident that the resumption of snagging and cleaning operations will lead to a restoration of navigation for a large part of each year and that this navigation will have a favorable effect on railroad rates, as was so notably the case from 1880 to 1885, long after the removal of the raft and the arrival of the railroads and when conditions were practically what they are to-day. The present rivers and harbors bill carries an appropriation of $10,000 for Cypress Bayou and directs an examination as to the advisability of constructing a dam at the foot of Caddo Lake.

Before leaving Cypress Bayou let me say that the great ironore fields of northeast Texas find in Jefferson a logical point of conversion and transshipment. Large furnaces are already in operation at Jefferson, and pig iron of the finest quality has been turned out. It is stated by a geological expert of the United States Government, who recently examined these ore fields, that this ore would make as fine a grade of plowshares and car wheels as could be found anywhere.

SULPHUR RIVER.

Sulphur River traverses a large, productive, and rapidly developing territory, which is to-day without anything like adequate transportation facilities.

The country tributary to this river has undergone a great change within the last few years, its development and importance having increased at a marvelously rapid rate. The immigration to the section of country through which this river runs has been unparalleled in its history, the population at this time being estimated as practically one-third greater than it was three years ago. A part of this immigration may be rightly attributed to the fact that many of the larger landowners have cut their holdings into small tracts and disposed of them to the newcomers for potato, afalfa, corn, cotton, cabbage, and general farming Many of the larger holdings included vast areas of timber lands-especially is this true of the south side of the riverand these have been and are rapidly being cleared. The fame of the Sulphur River bottom lands has spread so rapidly that lands which could have been bought five years ago for $1 an acre, having since been cleared and improved, are now being sold at from $20 to $40 an acre. This land is adapted to practically any farm product grown, being extremely rich and loamy. There are few if any sections in this country that can boast of more fertile lands.

Atlanta, Queen City, Bloomburg, and other towns would receive great and direct benefit from the navigation of this river. The citizens of Atlanta own and operate a railroad, which does not owe a dollar and which has money to its credit in the banks, to a point—Bloomburg—within a few miles of the river. All merchandise which now comes to Atlanta from Shreveport and New Orleans—and practically all the staple groceries and feed-stuffs come from those points—is delivered at Bloomburg by the Kansas City Southern Railway, thence hauled to Atlanta by the citizens' railway. This railroad has been the means of saving the citizens thousands of dollars in freight charges, and with Sulphur River made navigable and this railroad extended to some point thereon, as has already been decided on in case of navigation, this saving in freight would be marvelously increased and the entire population benefited thereby. The president of this railroad told me in person that it cost at present 83 or more per bale to haul cotton to Shreveport by rail from Atlanta. At Atlanta alone there are 12,000 bales or more marketed every year, and with Sulphur River navigation this cotton could be transported profitably by boat to Shreveport or New Orleans for $1 per bale. This, however, would not be the extent of the river's cotton business, for navigation would undoubtedly soon be the cause of a compress being built at Atlanta or some neighboring point, which at a low estimate would bring at least 30,000 additional bales for shipment, to say nothing of what might originate in Texarkana or in the Sulphur River Valley westward from these two points. I glean from the offi-cial report of the Census Bureau the cotton yield of the counties composing the Sulphur River Valley, as follows

, County.	Year.	Bales.
Miller, Ark. Bowie Cass Delta. Franklin Hopkins Lamar Morris Red River	. 1904–5 . 1904–5 . 1904–5 . 1904–5 . 1904–5 . 1904–5	10, 62/ 21, 64/ 23, 39/ 29, 76/ 9, 93/ 40, 14/ 66, 64/ 9, 31/ 37, 394

I think that a conservative estimate of the river's cotton business each season would be about 270,000 bales, making an estimated saving of over $500,000. I do not attempt to make any estimate of cotton that might originate outside of the valley and find its way to New Orleans via this waterway.

I candidly believe, however, that the cotton business would constitute only a small part of the total tonnage. While hundreds of acres of land tributary to this river have been cleared, there yet remain thousands of acres of as fine timber as there is to be found anywhere. This is particularly true of the north side of the river. The timber is white oak, pine, gum, and hickory, the former as fine a stave and barrel wood as there is in the world. There are numerous barrel and stave factories in New Orleans and Shreveport which could use any quantity of this It is of especial value, and being situated right on the banks of the river it could be delivered at these factories at a nominal figure. There is practically no end to the quantity, and its quality is such as to make it a profitable market There is abundant tie timber in this region also, and navigation would furnish a cheap and convenient mode of transportation to the several railroads crossing the stream. The tie business has always been an extensive one in the Sulphur River bottoms, but not nearly so profitable as it would be were there any means by which the railroads could be conveniently and cheaply reached.

A further and most important argument in favor of this project is the greatly increased acreage in potatoes, cabbage, hay, and other feedstuffs in the territory tributary to this river. port is and has long been the accepted distributing point for the Atlanta section for products of this kind, and with cheap water rates to that point the saving in this line alone would amount to an enormous figure each season. Mr. F. M. Greene, of Atlanta, who has a plantation situated directly on Sulphur River, comprising 8,614 acres, states that of the several hundred acres which he has planted in potatoes he confidently expects a yield of from 200 to 300 bushels to the acre. Potatoes are worth on an average $1 per bushel in this section, and he says with cheap water rates to Shreveport that, in the course of probably three years, the average yield for the country immediately tributary to the river will amount practically to 250,000 bushels a season. As there are spring and fall crops, between 400,000 and 500,000 bushels will be marketed every year. The present rate on pota-toes from Atlanta to Shreveport is 23 cents per 100 pounds, and the transportation of this crop alone, even as low as 10 cents per 100 pounds by water—a rate lower than any railroad could possibly make—would be profitable, in the opinion of Mr. Greene, who has had extensive experience in transportation matters. The acreage in cabbage is being rapidly multiplied throughout this section, as can be said of alfalfa and onions, all of which are as profitable as that of potatoes and for which there is always a ready market. The aggregate of these crops will amount in tonnage to probably more than the potato crop.

In addition to these unquestioned contributing agencies there is, beyond a doubt, just opening up an industry on Sulphur River which will rival in importance any of those which have already been enumerated. There lie on and near the banks of Sul-phur River, a short distance above the Texas and Pacific Railroad bridge, extensive beds of lignite coal. A company has already been organized to manufacture briquettes, and when their plans are completed Sulphur River will furnish the means of cheap transportation for their products to the iron furnaces at Jefferson, in case Cypress Bayou is again made navi-If not, however, these products could be transported to Shreveport, for the use of manufacturing concerns, on coal barges and would undoubtedly bring immense revenue, as the fuel problem has always been one of seriousness in this section. A preliminary survey by the United States Geological Survey has already demonstrated the fact that iron ore abounds along Sulphur River in extensive quantity. An official of the Department told me in person that the lack of cheap and convenient means of transportation is the chief cause of the undevelopment of this valued asset. If Sulphur River were made navigable, and it only requires a small amount of dredging and snagging to be made so, it would undoubtedly mean the development of resources which are necessary to the advancement of man-ufacturing industries in east Texas. There is being projected, and there is every reason to believe it will be built, a railroad direct from the coal fields of the Indian Territory, which will cross Sulphur River some distance above the Cotton Belt bridge, and when this shall have been done it will practically solve the problem of fuel for the lower Sulphur River section, even should the supply of lignite briquettes prove inadequate. Even if this railroad should not be built the coal of the Indian Territory and Oklahoma can be transported down Red River to the mouth of Sulphur and thence up Sulphur. Thus the opening of Sulphur will give a water route from the coal fields of the Indian Territory to the ore regions of Sulphur. This will bring about the development of resources which would cause the greatest commercial activity this section has ever known. I wish to lay especial emphasis on this phase of the commercial possibili-ties of navigation on Sulphur River.

As to the physical practicability of the navigation of this river, there is not and has never been any doubt. Steamboats at one time plied this river between a point known as "Knights Bluff" and New Orleans, carrying large cargoes of cotton, and on return trips bringing supplies for the farmers living along the There are numbers of persons still living in Cass County, whom I know personally, and who saw these boats and made trips to and from New Orleans on them. This was in 1858, 1859, and 1860, and had any funds been expended in the betterment of the river, so I am told by river men competent to judge, this traffic would have continued and would have increased steadily in volume. But the river has been permitted to deteriorate and gradually to fill with large snags and other obstructions. I had a talk with Capt. D. W. Ray, who, some ten or twelve years ago, piloted a boat of 100 tons burden on regular trips from a point 70 miles above Sulphur Station to that station, where was located an immense lumber mill. Captain Ray is thoroughly familiar with Sulphur River, having lived near its banks for many years. He has seen boats plying the river on numerous occasions, and tells of the regular trips of the Buchanan and McDougall from points on Red River to points on Sulphur River. He remembers distinctly the landing of boats at Haggartys Landing, 20 miles above the Texas and Pacific bridge on Sulphur River, with cargoes of merchandise from New Orleans, and taking on for the return trip cargoes of cotton. He is enthusiastic over the benefits to be derived from the navigation of this stream and he is confident that it can be accomplished at a comparatively small cost.

I would not consider this statement complete without some reference to Sulphur River's excellent banks and sound, hard river bed. Its banks are high and exceptionally firm, the river never having been known to change its course. Its bed is of fine gravel and hard mud, having no sand to form bars and catch drifts.

As to the prospect of steamboat service on the river, in case it should be made navigable, I have to say that Mr. F. M. Greene, president of the Atlanta and Bloomburg Railway, has already expressed his intention of placing in commission a boat or boats to operate between New Orleans or Shreveport and a point op-posite Douglassville or Sulphur Station. Mr. Greene, a wealthy and progressive citizen of Atlanta, states that the products of his farm, to which I have previously referred, will alone justify him in putting on the boats, to say nothing of other business.

The benefit to be derived from the navigation of this river in the counties through which it runs would not fall exclusively to any man or set of men, however, but would be beneficial to the entire citizenship of both sides of the river. While the citizens of Atlanta and Texarkana seem more directly interested than those of any other city, Douglassville is so situated as to render navigation practically a necessity so far as its merchandise and produce shipments are concerned. Douglassmerchandise and produce shipments are concerned. Douglass-ville is situated only 3 miles from the river and is without rail-road facilities. The country intervening between it and the river is opened up and is in constant cultivation. There is an absolute necessity for some character of shipping facilities for this town and section, and Sulphur River is the natural agency. While these and other towns in this section are in a direct line for benefit, the navigation of the river would bring a commercial awakening to this entire section of the State. As will be seen from a glance at the map, the great and fertile section immediately tributary to Sulphur is almost entirely without railway facilities; consequently Sulphur River would serve as a great highway for an extensive territory.

In conversation with men who are in the fish business on the river, I find that this industry has grown to considerable proportions. The industry brings a revenue of from $40,000 to $50,000 yearly to those engaged in it and is taking on renewed growth each year.

The rivers and harbors act of March 3, 1905, ordered an examination of Sulphur River. The result of that examination is to the effect that the river can be made navigable at a cost of only $36,000 for a distance of 150 miles at such times as boats can enter it from Red River and that the river is worthy of improvement. (See House Doc. No. 870, 59th Cong., 1st Boats can enter Sulphur River from Red River practically throughout the year; certainly for at least ten months in every year. There will soon be two snag boats in operation in Red River above Shreveport, and one of these might be easily utilized. But, I submit, the most effective work can be done on Sulphur, so thick are the snags in many places, through the construction of one or more quarter boats, costing from $1,200 to $1,500. In view of the fact that at a cost of $36,000 a large and productive area in Arkansas and Texas will be given for the first time transportation facilities through the improvement of the stream in accordance with the recent report and estimate of the engineers, the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has in the present bill appropriated said amount for the purposes stated.

RED RIVER.

With proper care and improvement I believe most firmly that Red River will ultimately become one of the great rivers of the world and that it will become to the Southwest what the Mississippi and the Great Lakes highway are to their tributary sections. Red River is 1,200 miles long—400 miles longer than the Rhine, 300 miles longer than the Ohio, more than twice as long as the Seine and the Thames, a third as long as the Amazon, the Nile, and the Mississippi proper, and more than a fourth as long as the Mississippi and Missouri combined. In width and volume the comparison holds in corresponding degree. Its basin comprises almost 100,000 square miles and its tributary territory includes an additional 100,000 square miles. This section of 200,000 square miles is unsurpassed on either hemisphere for productiveness of soil and diversity of commodities. It is about equal to France in size and will produce a wider range of commodities than that great nation. It is easily capable of producing the present cotton and corn crops of the earth. It produces every fruit and grain and plant known to the temperate zone, and it is the statement of Atkinson, the famous statistician, that on one-twentieth of this area may be produced all the wheat that Great Britain now purchases from the United States.

Unlimited coal fields are on the Oklahoma side; vast deposits of iron ore are in the northern and eastern parts of the Texas side; oil and gas are being discovered in the Louisiana section. It is a safe assertion that over a million and a half bales of cotton are now produced in this territory and that it has a population of over a million people. It contains practically all of northeastern Louisiana, southwestern Arkansas, and large sections of the Indian Territory, Oklahoma, and Texas. The improvement of Red River and its tributaries, notably the Cypress and the Sulphur, will vastly increase the wealth, the population, and the general importance of the entire Red River area. It has been shown that six of the Texas counties bordering on upper Red River—Bowie, Red River, Lamar, Fannin, Grayson, and Cooke—comprising 6,000 square miles and being by no means entirely developed, have an annual farm tonnage of 36,000,000, an amount exceeded by few similar areas in the world. The Red River basin has a rainfall of only 5 per cent less than that of the entire Mississippi basin and the basins of all its other tributaries combined.

The section traversed by upper Red River is oppressed to-day by the highest railroad rates in the Union, outside of the Rocky Mountain region. To illustrate the economic disadvantage of the high rates under which this section labors, and the say that in the best would be effected by water rates. I need but say that in which would be effected by water rates, I need but say that in Texas the railway rate on grain for an average haul of 300 miles is 9½ cents per bushel, while the water rate from the ports on the Great Lakes to New York, an average haul of 1,200 miles, is 4½ cents per bushel, and from St. Louis to New Orleans, a distance of over 1,200 miles, 4½ cents per bushel. The railway rate on cotton per bale for an average haul of 165 miles from Houston, Tex., is practically $3, while the water rate from Memphis to New Orleans, a distance of 713 miles by water, is 80 cents per bale, and from New Orleans to Cincinnati, 1,600 miles, $1 per bale. The longest haul of cotton on Red River miles, $1 per bale. The longest haul of cotton on Red River and the Mississippi to New Orleans would not exceed 1,200 miles, while by far the greater amount of cotton and all other produce along Red River would be subjected to a haul decreasing from that distance to but little more than 200 miles.

The mouth of Red River in the Mississippi is about 200 miles from New Orleans by water.

The removal of the snags which have accumulated for decades in the channel of this river, especially the upper section; the clearing of timber from its banks, which are soft and alluvial and show quite a tendency to cave and break; the erection of training walls at proper intervals, and such other measures as the genius of the engineers may suggest, will concentrate its waters and make its navigation safe and permanent. On account of its peculiar physical characteristics the work of the Government must be continuous. And this brings me to the important point that the work under the appropriation of $100,000 for upper Red River by the last rivers and harbors bill, in which the upper section received its first substantial recognition, should under no circumstances be permitted to lag. About $50,000 of this initial appropriation has been expended in actual snagging and cleaning work by means of quarter boats with excellent results. The remainder of the appropriation has been devoted to the construction, care, and continued maintenance of a snag boat, which can only operate, of course, when the river is at certain mediate stages.

Quarter-boat work is the most effective, because the crews continue to work at all stages, and the snagging and clearing work of the quarter-boat crews should never stop. They have made a splendid start, and it would be a practical repudiation of the project for the Government to pause in the midst of this snagging and clearing work. If the work is not continued on the scale on which it was begun, the results already obtained will scon be neutralized and nullified and the moneys already expended rendered a practical waste. All the engineers' reports on Red River establish the fact that any work on this stream to be effective must necessarily be continuous. Snags have been accumulating in the upper section for decades, and unless the work of removing them is pressed most vigorously new accumulations are impossible of prevention. And this condition will exist until the entire upper section has been cleared completely of the accumulations of decades. When snagging work stops, the old snags that have not been reached serve as bases for new obstructions.

While the work done under the last appropriation has made navigation on certain stretches less dangerous, it has by no means made navigation safe for the section above Fulton. Nor do the engineers claim that this has been done. The secretary of the Board of Trade of Paris, Tex., the county seat of Lamar County, one of the largest counties bordering on Red River, writes me that a movement is on foot to form a navigation company for operation on the river as soon as it is put in shape by the Government. He adds:

There is no question but that Red River will be used extensively if the Government will only put it in such shape that it will be practicable to use good boats on it; but until there is more money spent on it the people do not feel disposed to invest in this navigation.

Already, however, there has been an actual resumption of commerce on upper Red River. During the past year Mr. G. W. Young has put on two boats, which have operated between Arthur City and the mouth of the Kiamichi. A lumber company at Sawyer, on the Kiamichi, has had two boats plying on upper Red River for the purpose of bringing lumber to the mill at Sawyer.

The Ames Shovel and Tool Company, of Paris, Tex., has sent an agent to New Orleans to purchase two good boats to be used on Red River, and they intend also to build a lot of barges. Boats have also been in operation during the past year from Fulton for a distance of 40 or 50 miles upstream. A bona fide effort is being made to follow up the work of the Government with actual navigation, and when once the river has been put in permanently navigable shape I am certain that the results will be of the most satisfactory nature.

Upper Red River offers the new State of Oklahoma practically the only water outlet for its immense and varied tonnage. Realizing this, the Oklahoma constitutional convention recently adopted a resolution, by unanimous vote, praying Congress to complete the improvement of upper Red River. The five Representatives in Congress whose districts border on upper Red River, namely, McGuire of Oklahoma, Stephens, Randell, and Sheppard of Texas, and Wallace of Arkansas, have all introduced bills calling for a liberal appropriation. Undoubtedly there is no project in the United States of sounder merit and more beneficent possibilities, and in recognition of this fact the present bill carries an appropriation of $100,000 for continued work on upper Red River.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, the limited time at my disposal will not permit me to make more than a passing observation up-on a section of country and its need of water communication with the markets of the world. The great inland empire of northern Idaho, eastern Washington, and eastern Oregon comprises an area larger than the combined area of the New England States. It has been talked of as a land of promise, and the natural waterway which God gave that region has been mentioned for years for its varied and magnificent scenic beauty. Nor are we of the Northwest insensible to this homage. all that has been said for it and it is more. The tremendous development that has gone on within the last ten years and the almost unparalleled increase in population serve but to emphasize the fact that the land of promise has become the land of realization, and that the rivers of beauty will not serve their purpose by remaining longer the mere models for the artists to copy and therewith adorn railroad pamphlets, waiting rooms of depots, and the guide-books of the Northwest. The time has come when more than ever we demand that the Columbia River, the Snake River, and their tributaries shall be made to serve the useful purpose of arteries of trade.

We talk of the regulation of railroad rates. We place laws upon our statute books for the equalization of the charges made. We accomplish splendid results through the vigilance of our Interstate Commerce Commission; but, sirs, that which, in my judgment, would avail more than all the laws we could pass and all the commissions we could appoint for the regulation of railway rates would be the adopting of a broad, comprehensive system for the development of the waterways of our land and the speedy execution of that policy.

Look our country over and it will be apparent that rates upon our railways are lower over those lines where water transportation furnishes a competitor. It matters not whether the freight is hauled in the slow-moving barge drawn by the weary mule or whether it is carried in the steamer of 2 or 4 or 10 foot draft, it is the same. Water competition drives down the rate. The reason why freight between Chicago and New York is hauled at one-fourth or one-seventh the price that is charged for carrying the products of the producers of northern Idaho a relative distance is because the Great Lakes, the Erie Canal, and the Hudson River furnish a means of water transportation. The reason why the railroads that serve Idaho charge two to five times as much for like freight service as do the lines paralleling the great waterway of the Middle States is because we have no other alternative than to pay the price that is asked for handling our freight. It will not do to say that we must pay more because the business is small and the railroads must charge an additional rate to insure fair profit on the capital invested. This will not do, because the business of the railroads of the Northwest at this moment is congested. They have more than they can do. Their rolling stock is on the move. They, in fact have a dearth of cars. The railroads can not supply the needed cars to furnish coal or deliver wood. They have not been able to handle our grain or our lumber. They have not been able to keep up with the output of our mines and deliver the ore to the A recent message tells me that one of the largest mines in my State has been closed down temporarily because it can not ship its ore. Yet for this service, sirs, these same railroads charge prices that are plainly out of all proportion to the work performed.

The greatest work that up to the present has been done toward the navigation of either the Columbia or Snake rivers was the construction of the canal and locks at the Cascades. The effect of this improvement was so striking that I shall give you the charges made by the railroads for handling our freight before and after the project was completed. The figures appear in a memorial addressed to this Congress by the legislature of the State of Washington and applied to rates between Portland and

The result, in fact, was marvelous.

Now, let me give you another illustration of the effect of water competition even in the Northwest. For years something has been done from time to time on the Columbia River and on the Snake River. Stretches upon both these rivers for many miles have been navigable for many years. Yet so long as a river or river system is not navigable its entire length the fact that it is navigable in parts avails little.

Only a few years ago public-spirited citizens evolved the idea of constructing a portage railway around the Celilo Rapids in the Columbia River between the States of Oregon and Washington. The legislature of Oregon appropriated $190,000 for this It was not sufficient, and some $40,000 additional was added in 1905, and, I may say, added by private subscription. It was the object of the portage railway to handle the freight of river craft between the stretch of navigable water above the falls and the waters below. The railway was completed and for two seasons has handled a portion of the trade, with this marked result:

In the first place, it successfully did much business itself, although working under the great disadvantage of being required to handle its freight above the Portage Railway and again below it—two handlings that should be removed.

In the second place, it did what laws or commissions had not done: It scaled down the charges of the railroads between the points tributary to the river and the city of Portland. In line with this statement, I desire to include in my remarks a statement prepared by Mr. Frank J. Smith, superintendent of the Open River Transportation Company, and addressed to the company's president and board of directors:

PORTLAND, OREG., December 31, 1906.

The president and board of directors of the Open River Transportation Company.

GEXTLEMEN: In reply to your request for a statement of results obtained by the opening of the upper Columbia River through the construction of the Portage Railway and the operation of boats on the river, I herewith submit the following report for your consideration:

RIVER RATES AND GENERAL BENEFITS.

RIVER RATES AND GENERAL BENEFITS.

During the present season of the fall of 1906 the Open River Transportation Company handled considerable grain at a rate ranging from 30 to 40 cents per ton less than rates in effect on rail line.

Merchandise was transported to river towns and also to interior points that were reached by wagon haul. The consignees at river points received their shipments at a saving of from 30 tq 50 per cent below rail rates to the same point. Interior towns have used the water haul for over 250 miles and hauled by team 20 miles inland at a saving over rail rates.

The farmer and merchant on the banks of the river have received large benefits. It has enabled them to not only market their produce locally, but to procure supplies promptly and at reasonable prices. Unused land that has been in pasturage for years is now being farmed since the boats have given the purchaser means of transportation. A number of new towns has been started along the banks of the river at points where wagon roads reach out to the farm lands of the interior. Old towns that have retrograded since the early steamboat days have been inspired with a new lease of life.

ELECTRIC LINES.

ELECTRIC LINES.

Electric lines from the interior reaching to the Columbia and Snake rivers have been organized, and in many cases much of the right of way has been freely given.

The open river movement has been directly responsible for these projects. The names and locations of roads are as follows:
Spokane Inland Railway, from Spokane to the Snake River.
Walla Walla and Columbia Electric Railway, from Dayton to Wallula, on the Columbia.
Bickelton and Northern Railway, from a point near Mount Adams to Alderdale, on the Columbia.
The Columbia and Northern Railway has surveyed a line from Hardman, through Gilliam and Morrow counties, to Blalock and some right of way secured.
A line has also been surveyed from Prosser, on the Yakima River, through the noted Horse Heaven wheat belt, reaching the Columbia at Patterson, opposite Irrigon.

After the Portage Railway was built and just before steamers were placed in operation, a reduction of 40 cents per ton was made on wheat from Arlington. Wheat was secured from Washington points by rail line, despite the fact that the river tariff was 25 cents per ton less than that published by rail, and a crossing charge of 50 cents per ton. In other words, a 75-cent per ton differential was met.

Condon, 45 miles in the interior, on the Arlington-Condon branch, took up the matter of shipping by river to Arlington and by the set of teams secure their shipments at a lesser rate. Following a visit of a representative of the river line to that city in April of this year a reduction was made by the rail line of from $1 to $3 per ton.

During the present year grain that was promised from some sections failed to appear on the river bank, and after a careful investigation of the case it was found that the farmer received benefits from the opening of the river in the way of price from buyers and accommodations from competing lines that prior to the operation of the river boats he was unable to secure.

At all landings wheat has brought a higher price per bushel than at points the same distance from market that had no river competition.

OREGON RAILROAD AND NAVIGATION TARIFF EFFECTIVE JANUARY 1, 1907. OREGON RAILROAD AND NAVIGATION TARIFF EFFECTIVE JANUARY 1, 1907. That the river line has proven a factor which can not be overlooked by the rail lines in making rates is indisputably shown by the new tariff issued by the Oregon Railroad and Navigation Company, effective January 1, 1907, in which sweeping reductions have been made. To show the sweeping nature of the reductions, I have prepared the following table showing the reductions at prominent points reached by steamer and to inland points where electric communication is contemplated:

Further reductions must be made by the rail line in order to meet river rates, which are still below the rail rates as reduced.

It must be apparent to the most casual observer that the Portage Railway is responsible for the reduction made and that the State is amply repaid for its investment, and its continued maintenance and extension abundantly justified.

Moreover, it will be observed that the reductions made by the Oregon Railroad and Navigation Company only apply to points affected by competition with the steamers of the Open River Transportation Company, made possible by the use of the Portage Railway. The charges made beyond river points show how far-reaching the benefits resulting from water competition extend.

GRAIN RATES.

But few changes have been made as yet by rail lines on grain, but the rate will undoubtedly be reduced, as the river rate is much lower, and will sooner or later have to be met. Although handicapped by operating a through line, over a portion of which we had no control, the high price of fuel, and other disadvantages, the Open River Transportation Company has proven not only a rate factor, but that the Columbia River is a navigable stream.

With a relatively small expenditure compared with the benefits which would result therefrom, the Columbia and Snake Rivers could be safely navigable for steamers of large capacity the entire year from Cello to Priest Rapids and to Lewiston. It is quite probable the legislature of Washington will aid in this work to the extent of $350,000 the approaching session.

The extension of the Portage Railway to The Dalles will be of inestimable benefit in both lowering rates and expediting handiing the traffic.

FRANK J. SMITH. Superintendent.

I shall make another comparison to emphasize the necessity of water transportation and shall avail myself of figures furnished in the memorial addressed to this Congress to which I recently referred. After the Cascade Canal and locks were completed, The Dalles had splendid water communication with Portland and the lower Columbia. The Celilo Falls being just above The Dalles, the vast territory above, including the Lewiston country and the Walla Walla country, were denied this advantage. The Portage Railway has caused a recent modification of the freight tariff touching the immediate stretch of country above Celilo tributary to the Columbia River, which I have already pointed out. Before this modification, however, the difference in freight charges made may be gathered from the following table:

Rates per ton in carload lots.

	Miles.	Salt.	Sugar.	Canned goods.	Grain.
Portland to The Dalles, water competi- tion	88	$1.50	$2.00	$2.00	$1,50
petition	187	7.50	10.20	10.20	3.00

Could any figures be more remarkable and striking to illustrate the outrage in freight rates perpetrated upon the people of the inland empire than those I have here shown you?

The only remedy for this injustice is the improvement of our waterway from the mouth of the Columbia to Lewiston, Idaho, and to the upper Columbia, in the State of Washington. Later improvements will follow, but this is our imperative need.

We want the Celilo project completed, and it will require a little more than $3,500,000, according to the engineer's report, to do that work. We then want obstructions in the upper Columbia River and the Snake River removed. We want water communication established between the heart of the great inland empire to the Pacific Ocean, and results more striking than those disclosed by the completion of the Portage Railway at Celilo must surely follow. This inland empire is distant from our nearest coast market from 200 to 700 miles. To haul our grain to this market the railroads charge us something like 14 cents per bushel, or from 4 to 5 cents per bushel per 100 miles. On the Mississippi River, between St. Louis and New Orleans, the rate per bushel per 100 miles is a little less than 1 cent. In other words, we are compelled to pay from three to four times as much for freight as we would need to pay could we have water transportation. And think what a saving this would mean to the producers of the inland empire. We ship to coast points about 40,000,000 bushels of wheat every year. Could we save on this shipment 10 cents per bushel every year we could still be paying rates higher than those paid for like shipments upon the Mississippi River, yet it would equal a sum greater than that required to complete this waterway. Could we save but half that, or 5 cents per bushel, our farmers would be better off to the extent of $2,000,000 every year. Could we save a proportionate amount on all our other products and on the freight that is brought from the coast points for home consumption, the benefit would be almost as great again. Now, let me give you a brief idea of the wealth and productiveness of the country for which I speak.

The area of tillable land within the counties within close proximity to the rivers is 10,000,000 acres, of which nearly 5,000,000 acres are being cultivated, and vastly more would be were freight rates lower. During the last ten or fifteen years this region has produced from 35,000,000 to 60,000,000 bushels of grain annually, about nine-tenths of which was wheat and one-tenth oats, barley, rye, and other grains. The same counties have produced annually for years almost 100,000 horses and cattle and about one-half million head of sheep and hogs. produce annually for shipment about $3,000,000 to $3,500,000 worth of fruits and vegetables, about $3,000,000 worth of hay, and $7,000,000 worth of dairy products. They have produced some $2,000,000 worth of wool and hides annually for years, and immense wealth of minerals. The Coeur d'Alène mines alone last year produced about $25,000,000 worth of ore. Vast copper mines await better transportation facilities and are contiguous to the Snake River between Lewiston and Pittsburg Landing. It is estimated that the white pine in northern Idaho alone would scale 2,700,000,000 feet, and it covers 270,000 acres of land. It is said by lumbermen to be the finest body of white pine in the United States to-day. In eastern Oregon there is a vast forest of yellow pine, which, it is estimated, would scale 2,500,000,000 feet, and which covers 250,000 acres. Tributary to these rivers, in Idaho, Oregon, and Washington, are other tracts of valuable timber awaiting the means to reach the markets of the world.

The population of this region is to-day not far from 600,000 people and the wealth $1,000,000,000. And so I could continue. but I do not have the time.

I do not urge a policy that is selfish. In contending for greater relief for the Northwest I do not forget the other sections of our country. I believe in a policy that will be broad and general and that will include every section. I have called especial attention to this policy as applied to a limited area because this is my home and I am familiar with it. I have referred to it not only to urge the needs of those I represent, but also for an illustration of what water communication and the development of our waterways would do for our whole country.

You say that a policy that I urge would be an expensive policy. In a sense, yes; but not so expensive as to continue under the policy of the past. I have shown that the people would be saved much of the outrageous rates they are now com-I nave shown that the saving in one year on the freight handled for the people of the inland empire would net almost $4,000,000, or more than that for which we of the Northwest ask for this great work. Expensive! Not in comparison with what it would save. More than this, it is an expense that is an investment. All the money that our Government wisely expends in the improving of our waterways will be worth throughout the years to come 100 per cent on the invest-ment. It is not an expense that exhausts itself. It is an investment that will require the minimum of care and will yield the maximum of profit, and the investment should be made now, There are many reasons why it should be made now.

Our railroad lines are overworked and our waterways should be developed to furnish adequate means of transportation. The present rates are excessive, and the waterways should be built now that our produce might be handled at reasonable rates. Again, the waterways should be provided now because it is true here, as it is true in every line of construction, that delayed construction is the most expensive kind. By making appropriations by piecemeal, by doing a little work here and a little work there, to be followed another year by only a small amount of work additional, while some good results follow, much of the work must be done over again with the funds of each new appropriation. By trying to be economic we are following in truth the most expensive policy. What we want then is a comprehensive policy, a broad policy, and a liberal appropriation for the development of our waterways. And what is more, we want the policy approved and inaugurated now

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I represent one of the districts in the great State of Pennsylvania. We have in that State, in the city of Philadelphia, probably more manufacturing and textile workers and more industries than there are in the same area in any other State, and they are all interested in getting this 35foot channel. But the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and that committee have decided on a 30-foot channel. I want to say briefly that I do not think that since we have had a Congress we have had a more capable chairman, a man who knows his business better than does the gentleman from Ohio, the present chairman of that committee. Taking everything into consideration, what he has recommended in this bill and what the committee has voted to put into the bill, I think the bill should pass. I am satisfied that the committee has done the best it could and that this bill ought to pass without any more conflict.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, this bill pending before the House in round numbers appropriates $83,000,000 for the improvement of the rivers and harbors of this country. glad that the committee saw proper to increase the appropriation for this purpose in this bill. It is also a source of gratification and pleasure to me to know that we are at last going to begin in earnest the improvement of our rivers and harbors on a larger scale, and to take care of them rather than spending the revenues of the Government in improving our foreign possessions and looking after the affairs of people who have little interest, as has been demonstrated by their actions, in this which has so long been taking care of them.

The conditions existing in the country at this time imperatively demand a larger appropriation for our rivers and for our harbors. We know by observation and by experience that the means of transportation in this country are already congested, and that they are unable to meet the necessities and the requirements of our developing commerce and trade. There is no railroad throughout this land but what to-day has more business than it can transact. They need more tracks, they need more freight cars, they need more passenger cars, they need more engines, in order to meet the demands which are daily made upon them.

When that is true, then certainly it is of the greatest importance that we should turn to the natural means of transporta-tion which has been furnished to us by the Giver of every good and perfect gift, and proceed to improve the rivers of this country, in order that we may have the benefit which would naturally flow from their improvement, and relieve, as far as possible, the congestion of trade and commerce with which the other means of transportation are unable to deal. [Applause.]

I desire to call attention to an address delivered a short time ago in Washington, by Mr. Richard H. Edmunds, editor of the Manufacturers' Record, at the rivers and harbors convention in Washington, on December 7. He stated the conditions existing at this time with more clearness and with greater force than I could possibly hope to do, and hence I shall adopt his words:

than I could possibly hope to do, and hence I shall adopt his words:

Overwhelmed by the magnitude of the country's expanding fraffic our transportation facilities are proving unequal to the strain. Our material development has already far outgrown our railroads. Unless our advancement is to be halted by the lack of machinery necessary for carrying on business—that is, the lack of the facilities for handling freight—at least $5,000,000,000 must be expended during the next ten years in the extension of the railroads of this country. This would mean that within that brief period we must increase by at least 50 per cent our entire railroad facilities. Really they should be very nearly doubled, for in all probability traffic will double. It is practically certain that ten years hence our iron production will have advanced from the 25,000,000 tons of to-day to an annual output of nearly if not quite 50,000,000 tons of to-day to an annual output of nearly if not quite 50,000,000 tons of to-day to an annual output of nearly if not quite 50,000,000 barrels six years ago to 40,000,000 barrels, must, with the increase of concrete construction, double and quadruple within ten year. In sky years the value of our farm and quadruple within ten year. In sky years the value of our farm property has risen from $20,400,000,000 to $28,000,000,000.000. This gain in the last six years in the value of farm property is equal to about 60 per cent of the total capital invested in all the manufacturing interests of the country. It is more than two-thirds as much as the total deposits in all the banks—national. State, private, and savings banks—and loan and trust companies throughout the land. The value of our manufactured products, $3,000,000,000 and agriculture nearly $7,000,000,000.000. This makes a total of $27,000,000,000, against $18,800,000,000,000. This makes a total of $27,000,000,000,000 ayards $18,800,000,000,000. This in the development of business during the last ten years, the future holds out far greater potentialties. Lin of the country. It is the one weak spot in the business outlook, and more than anything else endangers our prosperity.

These facts enable us to form some conception of the need of far more rapid expansion of transportation facilities than has yet been taken into account. Even though they should stretch to the utmost limit their ability to provide money and be able to add to their investiment $5,000,000,000 within the next ten years, it is questionable whether the raliroads would then measure up to the imperative needs of the times. Our foreign commerce is now $5,000,000,000 000 a year. In a few years it will be $5,000,000,000 or $6,000,000,000. Our harbors must be made ready for this doubling of their trade. Given adequate facilities our river trade will expand still more rapidly. Even now steel barges are being built at Pittsburg which, when loaded with coal, will not break cargo until they unload at Habana and other Cuban ports. The coal traffic of Panama and South America and the West Indies is within our grasp whenever we are ready to furnish the facilities needed to take it.

Shall American development be halted because of our inability to provide the facilities for the trade that awaits the activities of our people? To help meet this problem it is incumbent upon the National Government to begin a policy of the fullest utilization of the great rivers and waterways with which nature has so abundantly provided us. With an expenditure in the next ten years upon rivers and harbors of $500,000,000,000 as against the $5,000,000,000 or more which the railroads must undertake to provide for their work, we can so improve river transportation as to make it possible to lessen the burden upon the country due to inadequate transportation facilities. Nature has blessed us with great highways upon which to carry on a commerce which could be made worth untold millions to the country, but we have almost ignored and counted as of no value this priceless gift. It is as though we had been given tens of thousands of miles of profit alike of the country and the roads. Can we imagine that a great corporation, with limitless resources at its command, owning thousands of miles of railroad track, would be so indifferent to its own future as to be unwilling to remove the few rocks or the sand that, through some upheaval of nature, had here and there covered a few miles of its of the very suggestion is in itself absurd. Such a course would not, however, be more absurd economically than has been the policy of the American people with reference to their rivers and harbors. The time has come in the history of American development when every possible means which can be provided for the handling of traffic must be utilized, and utilized promptly. The condition which we face to-day is one of supreme importance. It is one upon which the unchecked progress and prosperity of the country depends. For this reason, if for no other, it is incumbent upon the American people, through the National Congress, to spend money with no niggardly hand to improve all of our great waterways, both filand and coastwise. These lines are not one of the provide the money for their studies utilization. Money so spent would not be wasted. It would not be scattered to the winds. On the contrary, it would be an investment which would yield to the whole country a larger percentage of profit than any other within the range of man's knowledge. Five hundred million dollars spent within the range of man's knowledge. Five hundred million dollars spent within the range of man's knowledge. Five hundred million dollars spent within the range of man's knowledge. Five hundred million dollars, which could be made to yield over $500,000,000 of farm provements would certainly yield an annual profit to the business interests of the country far in excess of that amount. The nation has sanctioned the spending of the Ohio and its tributaries would furnish transportation facilities for the vast but congested traffic of the world's iron and stell contex. Which we have a conserved with the pr domination of this great industry, such as no other country holds on any industry worthy to be counted in such a cataloguing of natural resources. Of wheat and corn we produce 3,500,000,000,000 for all Europe. But why attempt to enumerate our resources? The very cream of the good things of earth as the foundation for man's highest development and the mightiest expansion of human activities has been given with a lavish hand to this country. It is within our power to so utilize these resources as to immeasurably add to the wealth and happiness of the world. As we have the area and the resources sufficient to sustain a population of hundreds of millions of people, so we have with these advantages the opportunity of becoming the world's greatest leader in the betterment through the arts and sciences of humanity rather than destruction through war. As an essential part of this programme, the time has come when the American people should utilize to the fullest extent their rivers and harbors, the improvement of which will enable us as a nation to realize upon our boundless resources.

The world has entered upon a period of expansion in industry, in commerce, and in wealth such as man never saw before. Not in the United States alone, but everywhere are seen evidences of the great burst of activity which is taxing the energy and the transportation facilities of all the leading nations of earth. We justiy boast of the vast expansion under way in this country and of the increase of our foreign commerce to the point where imports and exports now aggregate over $3,000,000,000. But though the United Kingdom has only half of our population, its foreign trade during the first eight months of this year exceeded that of the United States by $900,000,000. If our foreign trade in proportion to our population were as great as that of the United Kingdom, our exports and imports, instead of reaching $3,000,000,000. But though the United Kingdom has only half of our natural resources and of the advantages for domestic and foreign tra

Mr. Chairman, taking into consideration these marvelous facts and figures which I have presented to you from this address, there is no justification which can be offered for a failure upon our part to improve our rivers and harbors. It is not only demanded by our necessities, but I believe that the improvement of every river capable of improvement to such an extent as to furhish the commerce to justify the expenditure will be indorsed by the people of America. I have received recently numerous letters from my constituents calling upon me to support the appropriations made for this purpose, and everywhere that you hear a voice from one end of this country to the other it is crying out for an improvement of the rivers and the deepening of the harbors, in order that this congestion of commerce may be re-lieved and in order that the prosperity of the country may be kept pace with by handling the products presented to the transportation companies for shipment. While this bill makes an appropriation in round numbers of $83,000,000, I believe that it falls short to a certain extent of making the appropriation it should I believe that the necessities of the country and the conditions existing demand a larger appropriation than that made in this bill. I believe that the people of the country would indorse with enthusiasm and with great unanimity an appropriation of at least $100,000,000, making it $50,000,000 each year, not only for this and next year, but for the years even ahead of us, until the rivers and harbors of this country are made navigable and are utilized for the purposes of trade. While I indorse the pending bill, as far as it goes-and, as I said in the outset, I am glad to see the appropriation made-I know this bill falls short in one instance of doing that which in my judgment it ought to do.

I believe there should be an appropriation made of $2,500,000 for the most beautiful river in all this country. It is not necessary, I am sure, to mention its name, for everybody knows it is the Tombigbee. [Applause.] That appropriation of $2,500. 000 is not in this bill, and the river is only given a small appropriation of $14,000 for maintenance from Demopolis to the city of Columbus. With the additional appropriation of $2,500,000, which was requested and which was desired for the improvement of this great artery of commerce, there would then have been a total appropriation carried by the bill of $85,500,000. The bill would then have been practically perfect, I will say to my good friend Mr. LAWRENCE, a member of the committee who sits before me. But because of the fact that this appropriation is not made in this bill to that extent it is incomplete, and it ought to be put in the bill before it becomes the law of the land. [Applause.] It ought to be done in the interest of commerce; it ought to be done for the glory of the American people; it ought to be done for the good of this country; it ought to be done because it would make the men and women and the little girls sing songs of praise in your ears, which would make you glad and make you rejoice in all the years that are to come, and in your declining years, when you should be turning your face toward the setting sun you would have those songs which would come from joyful and happy hearts to reward you for a work well done and for a duty dis-charged in accord with the best interests of the country and for the glory and welfare of all the people. [Great applause.] As a member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, my friend, I want you to help me in this important matter.

I secured in the last river and harbor bill a survey for this The engineer reported that the improvement was entirely feasible, and I will ask permission to insert that report in the RECORD. All the way through it, up to the very last clause, the report will be found from beginning to end to be of a most favorable character, but, unfortunately for us who are interested in this great river, the last paragraph in it left us without the hope which had before encouraged our hearts and inspired our lives. The engineer reported that the commerce did not justify the necessary expenditure, and in view of that fact the committee, I presume, did not see proper to include the necessary appropriation in this bill.

But I am going to put into this record statistics and facts to demonstrate and to show that the commerce will amply justify the improvement of this river, that all we need on the face of the earth is that the channel shall be deepened until we can have year-around navigation, and that when we can obtain yeararound navigation we can furnish the tonnage, because it is there to be furnished for transportation upon the rippling waves of this beautiful river. The engineer in his report says that one-fifteenth of the cotton crop of the United States is produced in the Tombigbee Valley. Grasp for a moment what that means when he says that one-fifteenth of the cotton crop is produced in this fertile valley.

That means the production of $40,000,000 can be found within the limits of this valley which would float upon this river if the transportation was furnished. The trouble is that we only have navigation about six months in the year, beginning in December, and with the uncertain navigation which we have there is to-day upon the river, as shown by the actual facts and figures, a tonnage of 140,000 tons. I want to call attention to the fact that the distinguished chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee [Mr. Burton of Ohio] once said in a speech that any river that could furnish a tonnage of over 100,000 tons was entitled to consideration looking to its improvement. I have the highest regard for him personally. I have the greatest respect for his judgment and for his opinion. I believe that he knows more about rivers and harbors than any man in the United States of America and that he knows as much or more than any man in the world on that subject. Therefore when he expresses the opinion that a river that can furnish 100,000 tons of freight is entitled to consideration looking to its improvement, it means a great deal, coming from the source from which it emanates.

I can demonstrate and show, and I will put the facts and figures in this record to demonstrate and show, that there is upon this river, with the uncertain navigation which now exists, a hundred and forty thousand tons of freight each year. Improve the river and give us certain all the year round navigation, and we can furnish, in my judgment, over 500,000 tons to be transported in the vessels which would immediately enter this inviting field just as soon as they knew that they had a channel which they could traverse the year round. But with the uncertainty of the channel, with the fact that by reason of the conditions existing they do not know when they can get in and out to secure the trade, the steamboats do not seek the trade as they would if they knew the channel would be open and they could travel it the year round. There would be no trouble from any other source because there is no place where the sun shines more beautifully and where the moon glows with her silvery rays with greater grandeur than along this beautiful There is no reason on earth indeed why these steamers should not run all the year round except the necessary money to be added to the appropriations in this bill to furnish this channel and open this river to the trade. Why, my friends, this river has been sought for far and wide by those seeking that which was beautiful and that which was grand. They have sought it because of the fact it furnished an invitation to admire the beauties of nature, because along it from one end to the other the grandeur and sublimity of Almighty God's creation shines forth with a degree of perfection that is scarcely reached in any other country in the world. [Loud applause.] We have heard distinguished gentlemen upon this floor talk about the Mississippi River. I love the Mississippi, because there is no Commonwealth in all this broad land that gets closer to my heart and my affections than the Mississippi.

Oh, that beautiful name that we treasure, which we love, and to which we cling! The little ones around the fireside in our homes are taught to sing its praises and to speak forth its virtues. I love that name, and I am glad that the great "Father of Waters," the Mississippi River, that furnishes the marvelous means of transportation from the Lakes to the Gulf, has the same name as the State within which I live and which I have the honor in part to represent; but the Mississippi, my friends, sinks into insignificance in its grandeur and its beauty in comparison with the Tombigbee. [Applause.] I have heard Members talk about the Missouri River—and I love old Missouri, too, with all my heart. Yes; grand she is in her history and grand she is in her productions. We heard to-day upon this grand she is in her productions. We heard to-day upon this floor one of her brilliant and gifted sons, whom I love and admire [Mr. Clark], speak forth words of truth and words of beauty, and he spoke of certain interests that lie near the hearts of the Missourian. But I will tell you, my friends, that it is a fact that the Missouri River, and even the other rivers which are closely connected, by interest or otherwise, can not be compared in any way to this beautiful river that a kind Providence presented to the people of the country in which I live as one of the best gifts that has ever fallen from His hands. [Applause.]

If I should talk here until my time expired—and it soon will expire—in fact, if I should continue until the "wee small" hours of the morning, I could not portray to you anything like its beauties, anything like its importance, anything like the facts and the figures that necessitate its improvement.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Butler of Pennsylvania in the chair)

The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANDLER. May I have a few moments more? My heart yearns to tell a little more about this important river. [Applause.]

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman—

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Massachusetts rise?

Mr. LAWRENCE. The "gentleman from Massachusetts" rises to ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Candler] may be permitted to continue his remarks for five minutes.

for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LAWRENCE] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER] may be permitted to continue for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair is pleased to say there is no objection. [Applause; cries of "Go on! Go on! Tell us more about your river!"]

Mr. CANDLER. My heart goes out in gratitude to my distinguished friend from Massachusetts [Mr. LAWRENCE] and also to the Members of the House for this great favor. I am sure that it is prompted by the interest in this great river about which I am talking, because we all know that it appeals to the heart of every American citizen throughout this broad land; and the regret that they have to-day, and they have expressed that regret to me often, is that it has been so long neglected. I have heard its murmuring waves as they went singing their beautiful song toward the Gulf since the early days of my childhood, and they have continued to sing along the pathway of my life and have given me inspiration to love the beauties of pathway and the continued to sing along the pathway of my life and have given me inspiration to love the beauties of nature and admire those grandeurs and those glories that come alone from the kind creative hand above. [Applause.] Members have talked here, as I said a moment ago, about the Mississippi, and about the Missouri, and numbers of other rivers, and about the necessity for improvement. Other friends of mine have discussed their projects and have presented to the consideration of this House the rivers which they desired to see the hand of the National Government aid and the hand of the National Government deepen and widen.

ational Government deepen and widen.

The Tombigbee River does not need any widening. It is wide

The Tombigbee River does not need any widening. That is all enough. It just simply needs a little deepening. That is all that is necessary, and with the deepening that should come from the aid that ought to be bestowed upon it by "Uncle who has always given with bountiful hand to his children, there would come added beauties and benefits to the beauty and commercial importance that already exist that would strike the American people with such dazzling grandeur and sublime interest as to illuminate not only the Tombigbee territory, but would travel beyond the confines of that territory and add added glories even to our marvelous oceans and to all our waterways. [Applause.] It would furnish a bouquet of grandeur and glory that would justify the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to bring in a bill appropriating every dollar "Uncle

Sam" could spare for the improvement of the rivers and harbors of this country, and all it would be necessary to do would be for my esteemed friend Mr. Burton to stand on the floor of this House and present it, and the Representatives of the people would rise up and demand that it be passed at once without amendment, in order that the beauties obtained in the perfection of such legislation might not be lost. [Applause.]

The Mississippi was never known in song, the Missouri and these other rivers have never inspired the poet; but the Tombigbee has appealed to him and to the composer of beautiful song. I have a song here and I intended to sing it, although I am not a singer. [Great applause and cries of "Sing it, 'Tombigbee,' sing it! Let us hear you sing it!"]

If there ever was a time when I longed to be able to sing, it is now. In that respect my education was neglected. My good mother—God bless her—at one time wanted me to take music lessons, but I did not see the necessity for it. But I did not know that the day would come when I should stand here in the House of Representatives of the United States advocating the Tombigbee River.

If I had, I would have taken lessons from the best music teacher I could have found, and then I would have been prepared to sing this song, and when I should have sung it I am satisfied you would have said: "Take your $2,500,000, because your river is worth it, and worth more." [Loud applause.]

But, unfortunately, my friends, I can not sing. I wish I could. My soul panteth now for that accomplishment as "the hart panteth for the water brooks;" but it is impossible, because my voice is husky and I am fearful that I could not carry the tune. But I am going to read it to you, because I want the country to realize that this is one among a limited few rivers in the United States of America that has brought forth weak resulting the country for some converged in this beautiful some forth such sentiments as are expressed in this beautiful song.

Mr. RAINEY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER] yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY]?

Mr. CANDLER. Always with pleasure. Mr. RAINEY. I want to ask the gentleman how about the Wabash River in Illinois?

Mr. CANDLER. I am going to tell about that in this song.

Mr. TOWNE. How about the Suwanee River?

Mr. CANDLER. It is also mentioned in this song. woman-God bless them, in their kindness they are always willing to help us-secured this song for me, and it was composed by Hub Smith and dedicated to a beautiful woman, Mrs. Noyes. Entirely natural and proper to compose a beautiful song about this lovely river and dedicate it to God's sweetest creation-woman. [Great applause.] woman. [Great applause.]

Now listen, for here it is. How I wish I could sing! [Applause.] It is entitled "The Dear Old Tombigbee."

In the dear old sunny South,
Where the sweet magnolias bloom
And the joyous songs of countless birds
Dispel all thoughts of gloom;
'Neath the shade of fragrant trees,
Where the gentle breezes blow,
There the dancing waters of The old Tombigbee flow.

[Applause.]

It was on thy mossy banks
As a boy I used to play
With the comrades of my youth who now,
Alas, have passed away.
Ev'ry shady nook we knew,
And how oft our childish glee
Waked the echoes on the shores
Of dear old Tombigbee.

[Laughter and applause.]

CHORUS:

CHORUS:
The Mississippi's wide and grand,
The Suwanee's famed in song;
The waters of the Wabash, too,
Flow merrily along.
But all their beauties pale and fade
And have no charm for me,
For I have known since childhood days
The dear old Tombigbee.

[Laughter and great applause.]

My friends, I appeal to you to take care of the Tombigbee. Never forget it! Never forget it! As I said once before on the floor of this House, that while I honor my name because I am named for the man I love better than any other man in all the world, my honored father, but in order to see justice done to this river, in order to see the appropriation made which I believe ought to be made, I would be willing, not to give up my name, but to have added to it "Tombigbee," and be known hereafter as "Tombigbee Ezekiel Samuel Candler, Jr." [Loud and pro-Ionged applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. CANDLER. As a part of my remarks I append the report of the engineer in reference to the Tombigbee, the statement of Mr. I. H. Sykes, and "An answer to Document 334."

PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION OF TOMBIGBEE RIVER FROM DEMOPOLIS, ALA., TO COLUMBUS, MISS.

PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION OF TOMBIGBEE RIVER FROM DEMOPOLIS, ALA., TO COLUMBUS, MISS.

ENGINEER OFFICE, UNITED STATES ARMY,
Mobile, Ala., December 9, 1905.

GENERAL: In compliance with directions contained in Department letter dated March 23, 1905, I have the honor to submit the following report upon a preliminary examination of the "Tombigbee River, from Demopolis, Ala., to Columbus, Miss., with a view to securing a continuous channel 4 feet deep."

Previous examinations and surveys.—The first survey of this section of river was made in 1871, and report thereon is published in the Annual Report of the Chief of Engineers for the same year, page 573. The project provided for removing obstructions and building wing dams, and was adopted in 1872. It was modified in 1879 so as to provide for a low-water channel of navigable width and 3 feet deep by removing obstructions, building wing dams, and closing island chutes. This project was not completed.

Preliminary report upon a survey of Warrior River below Tuscaloosa, the Tombigbee River from its mouth up to Vienna, and from Vienna up to Walkers Bridge is published in the Annual Report of the Chief of Engineers for 1888, part 2, page 1227. Report of a survey and estimate for 6-foot navigation on Warrior River, Alabama, from Tuscaloosa to Demopolis; Tombigbee River from its mouth to Vienna, and Tombigbee River between Vienna and Cotton Gin is published in the Annual Report of the Chief of Engineers for 1890, part 2, page 1719. The improvement was recommended and the project was adopted by the river and harbor act of September 19, 1890, and provided for securing the proposed 6-foot channel by snagging, tree cutting, bank revetment, bar improvement, and the building of dams with pneumatic gates at an estimated cost of $779,400 for this section. In 1897 the estimate was changed so as to provide $2,000,000 for the construction of ten locks and dams between Demopolis, Ala., and Columbus, Miss. A few borings made indicate that the bed of the river over almost the whole distance covered by the examination is composed of blue rock or rotten limestone. In nearly all places the surface was found to be of sand and gravel. Probably, however, the limestone or blue rock is underneath throughout. The nature of this rock is such that when exposed to the air it hardens, but when submerged it is soft, so that in place it is easy to excavate. At nearly, all points along the river there are high steep bluffs, the concave bank being lime rock and the convex bank flat and soft. Tenmile shoals (so called from their length) is about the only place where there is no bluff. Here the river meanders between low alluvial banks of light sandy soil and unstable material, which yields readily to the eroding action of the river. The banks of this soil are from 8 to 12 feet above low water, and in most places are overgrown with willows and underbrush. In the limited time available it was not possible to obtain any reliable data as to current observations, but it is apparent that the discharge of the Tombigbee River is much greater than that of the Black Warrior River and that there will be an abundance of water for canalization.

Previous improvement.—Work on this section of Tombigbee River has heretofore been confined to the removal of logs, snags, and other obstructions from the channel and overhanging trees from the banks, building and repairing jetties, and excavating rock, gravel, sand, and clay. Work of this nature is needed every year to remove obstructions brought into the stream during freshets, as these freshets reach a height of between 40 and 60 feet above low water. The work done has resulted in affording a channel navigable for the light-draft boats plying this section, on a 2-foot rise above mean low water, for a period of four or five months per annum.

Geographical location.—Columbus, the upper limit of the improvement, is the country seat of Lowndes County, Miss., and is located in the eastern part of the State

Resources and commerce.—The principal farm products of the country are cotton and corn, the yield being from one-half to one bale of cotton to the acre, and from 25 to 40 bushels of corn to the acre. Cotton is the chief crop, about one-fifteenth of the total yield of the United States being grown here. The cotton-seed oil, oil cake, meal, and hulls will about equal the value of the cotton lint itself. Much of the country along the river and adjacent thereto is heavily timbered with pine, oak, cypress, sweet gum, and sycamore. The making of staves is at present in active operation, and with additional transportation facilities this would most likely become a staple industry. The lime-rock producing area is considerable, but it will probably never be made an article of extensive trade without cheap river transportation. Another rock found in the formation of the river bank, called "Tombigbee rock." yields a Portland cement which has stood the analytical test. With the river open the year round there is no reason to doubt that cement factories would multiply in this region.

No commercial statistics could be obtained at the time of examination, though efforts were made in that direction. Statistics for the calendar year ending December 31, 1904, showed that cotton, cotton seed, logs, breadstuffs, fertilizers, farm supplies, provisions, and general merchandise to the amount of 20,000 tons and the value of $600,000 were handled during that year.

Improvement considerations.—The only tributaries of any importance between Columbus and the junction of the Tombigbee and Warrior rivers, just above Demopolis, are the Sipsey and Noxubee rivers, both of them small streams. A study of the section under consideration makes it clearly evident that the only method of making much improvement is by canalization. This will require the construction of ten locks and dams, at an estimated cost of $2,500,000. The banks being generally a rock bluff on one side and fairly stable on the other, they are unusually favorable for this class of structure. At or near each lock site there would be an abundance of stone, gravel, and sand for the masonry and for riprapwork.

Conclusions.—No further survey is considered necessary, the records of this office being sufficient for the purpose of preparing a prellminary estimate of cost.

I do not recommend the upper Tombigbee River as being worthy of locks and dams, because apparently, the amount of business would not justify expending the amount of money.

Respectfully submitted.

STATEMENT OF I. H. SYKES, SECRETARY PROGRESSIVE UNION, COLUMBUS,

Statistics covering resources of the six countles—Lowndes and Noxubee, in Mississippi, and Pickens, Greene, Sumpter, and Marengo, in Alabama—show their past and present commercial importance, as well as the estimated increase were the Tombigbee River opened to navigation the year round from Demopolis, Ala., to Columbus, Miss.

While other counties adjacent to the above would materially feel the benefits derived by the opening of the Tombigbee, your statistician feels that the crying demand of the six counties named, all of which, being touched by many miles of river frontage, is sufficient to warrant the expenditure that would be required by the National Government in opening to year-round transportation this important waterway.

AREA-POPULATION-PRESENT COTTON PRODUCTION.

By the census of 1900 we find the area in square miles in the counties named to be 4.655, with a population of 179,550. By reference to map No. 1 herewith, we find two-thirds of the area of these six counties (the Tombigbee River running through the center) to be wholly and entirely dependent on the Tombigbee for transportation facilities, since no line of railway crosses the Tombigbee in this area and only one paralleling it from north to south and that coming no nearer at any point than 20 miles, thus leaving 3.104 square miles, or 1,986,560 acres, of the most valuable alluvial lands to be found wholly dependent for transportation facilities on a river navigable, at best, not exceeding six months in the year.

Since cotton is the principal product of the area lying in the counties named, I beg leave to submit the production in bales of 500 pounds in these counties for the years indicated:

County,	1900.	1901.	1902.	1903.	1904.
Noxubee Pickens Greene Sumpter Marengo.	20, 907 23, 928 21, 485 24, 017 31, 906 38, 392	21, 224 24, 000 19, 375 22, 167 29, 637 37, 504	21,500 26,751 17,161 21,647 26,295 35,682	22, 776 29, 474 16, 478 20, 502 24, 560 34, 931	30, 161 30, 284 23, 710 27, 667 28, 477 37, 232
Total	160,635	152, 107	149,036	148, 721	177, 581

Average yield in one year, taking above as a basis, 157,606 bales. With a river navigable the year round the saving to the planter in freights incident to the marketing of his crop of cotton alone on present average production, to say nothing of the increase made possible by open river, would be $1 per bale, or $157,606 annually.

ASSESSED VALUATION.

ASSESSED VALUATION.

An examination of the tax records of the counties named shows that the assessed valuation of all properties in the six counties for the year 1891 was $13.685,101, and that properties in these same counties are assessed for this year, 1906, at $23,178,156, or an increase in fifteen years of the assessment rolls by $9,493,055, or a little over 70 per cent. As shown on another sheet in these statistics, under the heading of timber, were the Tombigbee opened to navigation the year round a timber acreage of 993,280 acres would be placed under the plow, and when this has been done these acres would at once command on the market $25 per acre, or a total of $24.832,000, a little more in actual value than the present assessed valuation of the six counties.

From another standpoint, this timber land is assessed on an average of $1 per acre, while cultivated lands adjacent to the river are assessed at $6 per acre.

Taking the assessed value of these timber lands when cultivated $5,559,680, and from that deduct the present assessed valuation of these same acres, $993,280, we have at once an increased assessment of $4,966,400.

By personal investigation and from letters received from reliable.

of $4,966,400.

By personal investigation and from letters received from reliable parties in the several counties named the average annual per cent of increase in the assessment rolls of these counties, were the Tombigbee opened to navigation the year round, would be 46 per cent, or a total annual increase in the rolls, from a dollars-and-cents standpoint, of $10,661,951.

BANKS.

Map No. 2 a shows that in the area under consideration there are twenty banks; fifteen years ago there were only seven banking institutions in the counties referred to. Of these twenty banks, exclusive of the cities of Columbus, Miss., and Demopolis, Ala., we find only one on the banks of the Tombigbee, that at Gainesville, Ala.

It is a well-established fact that banks never seek a location where transportation facilities are limited to a few months of the year. It therefore stands to reason were the Tombigbee opened to navigation the year round banks would be established along this waterway at many points now offering good openings except for proper transportation facilities.

many points now offering good openings except for proper transportation facilities.

OIL MILLS.

By reference to map No. 1 herewith it will be seen that in 1891 there were only two oil mills located in the counties referred to, while to-day these same counties have ten large oil mills within their borders, and, notwithstanding the immense quantities of cotton seed produced in the area tributary to the Tombigbee River from Columbus to Demopolis, exclusive of the above-named cities, we find only one oil mill on the banks of the Tombigbee, at Epes, Ala.

Your statistician is informed by local oil-mill men that owing to the uncertain stage of navigation, even during the winter months, on the Tombigbee, many hundred tons of cotton seed rot along the banks of the Tombigbee each year. Now it stands to reason that were this river made navigable the year round oil mills as well as other factories would spring up along its banks, thereby enhancing the values of all lands in this rich section as well as placing in the pockets of the planter many thousands of dollars from the sale of his seed that now rot on the banks of the river waiting for the waters to rise sufficiently to market one of the chief products of his year's toil.

COAL.

COAL.

One of the greatest commercial industries in this section, if not in the world, is the mining and shipping to interior and port markets of coal for domestic as well as steam purposes. The National Government has expended large sums of money at the port of Mobile, Ala, that ocean-going vessels might make that harbor and load for the ports of all foreign markets. The owners and operators of mines in the coal fields of Alabama have likewise spent vast sums in the endeavor to economically deliver their product at the various ports. They have tried Greenville and Vicksburg, Miss., as well as Memphis, Tenn., but owing to the long haul by rall from the mines to these Mississippi River points, coupled with the great distance to New Orleans by barge, their efforts have proven unprofitable. Not a few of these large mining companies, the Corona Coal Company predominating, have acquired large and valuable river frontage at Columbus, Miss., believing that some day the National Government would be compelled by the constant demands made upon it to open to navigation the year round the Tombigbee River, thereby furnishing them by short rail and river haul access to the markets of the world through the port of Mobile.

See map No. 3.º Distance, Corona to Columbus by rail, 69 miles; Columbus to Mobile, air line, 189 miles.

TIMBER.

TIMBER.

Taking the census report of 1900, we find in the six counties named an area in square miles of 4,655. The tax records of these counties show two-thirds of this land open, the other one-third in virgin forests of oak, hickory, walnut, gum, cypress, and pine, making a forest impossible to develop without proper navigation on the Tombigbee of 993,280 acres, that, at the low estimate of 4,000 feet per acre, would produce in lumber approximately 4,000,000,000 feet, worth at the least calculation $10 per thousand, leaving after timber has been cut an acreage of 993,280 in lands that would readily bring $25 per acre, or a total value of $24,832,000.

If this same land were cultivated in cotton, to the growth of which it is peculiarly adapted, the annual increase in the production of cotton in these six counties would be, on a basis of one-third bale to the acre, 331,070 bales, or an annual increase in dollars and cents, at the present value of $50 per bale, of $16,553,500; 165,535 tons of cotton seed from above cotton, at the low estimate of $12 per ton, $1,986,420; total, $18,539,920.

THE CEMENT RESOURCES OF THE TOMBIGBEE RIVER DISTRICT.

The above being a question that has been passed on by geological experts in the employ of the Government, I beg only to call your attention to a few pertinent facts as laid down by these experts, but would suggest that in passing on this very important phase of the matter you read carefully Senate Document No. 165 of the Fifty-eighth Congress, third session. The Hon. Charles D. Walcott, Director United States Geological Survey, in his report, as per above document, makes the following statement:

statement:

"Determining the possible value for Portland cement manufacture of a deposit of raw material is a complex problem, depending upon a number of distinct factors, all of which must be given due consideration. The more important of the factors are:

"First. Chemical composition of the material.

"Second. Physical character of the material.

"Third. Amount of material available.

"Fourth. Location of the deposit with respect to transportation routes.

"Third. Amount of material available.

"Fourth. Location of the deposit with respect to transportation routes.

"Fifth. Location of the deposit with relation to fuel supplies.
"Sixth. Location of the deposit with respect to markets."

Your statistician begs to call your attention to the fact that Document No, 165, referred to, shows conclusively that from every stand-point save one, and that transportation, the deposit of high-grade Portland cement material, through, you might say, the center of which flows the Tombigbee, is the most valuable to be found anywhere.

Now, it is this avenue of transportation, making accessible to the markets of the world this inexhaustible supply of Portland cement material, that we pray your honorable body to furnish by the opening, as asked for, of the Tombigbee River.

Were this means of transportation available to-day there would be saved to the National Government many times the cost of the improvement asked for in the cost of the one item alone of Portland cement now being used in the isthmian canal construction.

While it is true that there is now a large cement plant on this river at Demopolis, this creates only limited competition, but were navigation extended up the river the cement industry along the valley of the Tombigbee would equal, if not in a few years outstrip, in tonnage as well as in money valuation the enormous cotton crop now annually produced in this territory.

MAJOR CRAIGHILL'S REPORT.

The Dispatch devotes considerable space this morning to the report of Major Craighill, the Government engineer under whose direction the survey of the Tombigbee was made, and we want every reader of this paper to peruse it carefully. This is the opinion of the engineer as to the feasibility of the work. It will be seen that after making a careful survey of the stream from this city to Demopolis he reports favorably upon every physical obstacle encountered. He shows that the waterfall is not too great to be overcome by a system of locks; he estimates the number of locks and their probable cost; he calls attention to the stable and safe foundations that can be secured, the bottom of the canaliseling blue rock and limestone; he shows that the banks are high and steep, composed of limestone, affording favorable location for the character of the improvements contemplated; he states that the volume of water is large, much larger than that of the Black Warrior, and that there is ample water for canalization; he reports that there is an abundance of stone, gravel, and sand at all lock sites for the masonry and riprap work; in fact, his report as to the feasibility of the project from an engineering standpoint could not be more favorable. The only surprising paragraph of his report is the last section, in which he advises against the improvement because "apparently the amount of business done would not justify expending the amount of money."

To say that this conclusion is inconsistent with the previous report is placing the case mildly. Mr. Craighill reports that the project is an admirable one from an engineering standpoint, and then knocks it because "apparently" the volume of business done would not justify the expenditure. But let's see what he says about the country through which the river runs, the volume of business adone would not justify the expenditure. But let's see what he says about the country through whic

But further he says: "Much of the country along the river and adjacent thereto is heavily timbered with pine, oak, cypress, gum, and sycamore. The making of staves is at present in active operation, and with additional transportation facilities this would most likely become a staple industry." Again he says: "The lime rock producing area is considerable, but it will probably never be made an article of extensive trade without cheap river transportation." Again he says: "Another rock found in the formation of the river bank, called 'Tombigbee rock,' yields a Portland cement which has stood the analytical test. With the river open the year round there is no reason to doubt that cement factories would multiply in this section."

Major Craighill states that no commercial statistics could be obtained at the time of the examination, although every effort was made to secure them.

Now, in view of his own figures given above, showing conclusively that the section through which the river runs is rich in undeveloped resources of every kind, after considering his own estimate that one crop of this section alone is worth $80,000,000 annually now after contemplating the marvelous possibilities of this section as indicated from his reports as to the timber and cement resources, we would like for Major Craighill to explain how he arrives at the conclusion that "apparently" the volume of business to be done on this river would not justify the expenditure of $2,500,000 for its permanent improvement. His conclusion is inconsistent, his report is contradictory, he reverses himself from his own statement of facts.

The more thoroughly the report of the engineers upon the Tombigbee project is assimilated, the more carefully it is analyzed, the more it is understood, the more firmly fixed is the conviction that there has been some "influence" at work to discredit this project. And this being true, the more determined should become the people of this city and section to combat this influence and to secure for them what is rightfully

A STATEMENT BY CITIZENS OF COLUMBUS.

A STATEMENT BY CITIZENS OF COLUMBUS.

The report of the United States engineer makes cost of necessary locks and dams to be $2,500,000. Interest on this at 2 per cent would be $50,000, and add the same for annual care and working the locks, the total yearly charge would be $100,000.

The estimate of I. H. Sykes, secretary of the Columbus Progressive Union, of tonnage for the season of 1904-5 is 140,000 tons. If one-half of this is cotton and cotton products, to say 70,000 tons, we have the equivalent of 280,000 bales of cotton. The saving in freight on cotton by river against rall is $1 to $1.25 a bale, so that on this item there is a saving of $280,000. The other 70,000 tons is miscellaneous freight, all carrying a higher rate than cotton; but allowing the same rate, the saving there is $280,000, or a total saving on the whole 140,000 tons of $560,000, more than 20 per cent of the cost of the improvements.

Columbus alone handles an average of 45,000 bales of cotton, on which there would be a saving of $45,000; and on its other freights there would be more than an equal amount, to say altogether $90,000 a year. This estimate is made on a six months' uncertain river. Indeed, the tonnage carried on the river any year only represents that which the people have been unable to haul to the railroads. The river is seldom navigable before the middle of December—the rains that make it so make the roads impassable. The crops are ready and begin to move in September, so that the river farmer hauls his crop to market before December while the roads are good. That taken by boat is the surplus that could not be hauled, and varies violently according to the seasons.

The figures of I. H. Sykes of 1904-5 are disputed by Mr. Kennerly, an "inspector" of the United States engineer's office at Mobile, but Major Jervey, his superior officer, concedes that the tonnage may have been 52,000 tons. At a saving of $4 a ton on this extremely low tonnage, the saving was $208,000, an excess of $108,000 over interest and maintenance, suffic maintenance, sufficient to warrant the investment.

This tonnage was derived in five months' operation, uncertain river, and a lot of boats running from the middle of December to the middle of May.

Neither Major Jervey nor Mr. Sykes takes any account of the lumber and stave business done by gasoline boats, barges, and rafting, a business that constitutes a very large part of the export trade of Mobile. Were the river navigable the whole year it would reduce freights at an equivalent of $1 a bale on cotton, and in the same ratio on all commerce in the Tombigbee Valley, whose annual total is valued at $80,000,000. How? If the farmer living on or in wagon reach of the river can ship his cotton to Mobile at $1 a bale, it would all go to the river, as 50 cents a bale will move cotton 20 miles. The railroads would at once meet the competition and reduce their rates accordingly, so that the farmer on the other side of the railroad for, say, 20 to 30 miles would get the benefit of the river competition. The same results would accrue on the east. Thus the commerce of the whole Tombigbee Valley, worth $80,000,000, is affected by this improvement.

One railroad that partakes of this commerce made for the year ending June 30, 1905, after paying all expenses, including rentals and interest on its bonds, net, over 16 per cent on its capital stock. Its earnings up to January 31, 1906, indicated, net, for the year ending June 30, 1906, over 26 per cent. These figures are taken from a banker's statement, handling the securities of the railroad company.

So that a reduction in rates brought about by river competition would not bankrupt the railroads tapping the Tombigbee River. Indeed, the freight rates are practically the same now when the cotton crop is 13,000,000 bales as they were when the crop was 5,000,000 bales.

Laws have been made to protect everything north, east, and west. Vast sums appropriated to dig out their harbors and canalize their rivers, while so little has been done for this section. We are an agricultural the products of American pean gold.

The Government has listed the Tombigbee as its own, a navigable stream. We can not bridge it without an act of Congress. The Government will not improve it, nor will it give a lease to an aggregation of local capital to improve it, nor may we harness its thousands of wasting horsepower to help the struggling people on its banks. If this be a sample of "government ownership," a thousand times better were it for the people that all public utilities be within private or corporate it for the people that all public utilities be within private or corporate control.

For twenty-five years have our people appealed to Congress to improve this river; have traveled its long reaches to get together in conventions, have spent time, money, and energy in this behalf, and now, when the Government's own engineer has given in the most conservative language an estimate of the resources of the country it would serve, showing that it produces one-fifteenth of the cotton crop of the United States, affording commerce of the value of $80,000,000, with enormous possibilities, we are again remitted to the waiting list. We have been smitten in Mobile, the house of our friends, riven by the hand of an engineer's clerk, charged with "furnishing information which was not correct" because, forsooth, we are "interested parties." Being thus tipped off in sweeping generalities by his clerk, Major Jervey falls into the error of creating the impression that the steamer Vienna was wrecked about a year ago from the date on which he was writing, and therefore not in the trade as noted by Mr. Sykes; and that the Hary and City of Camden were wrecked in September, 1906, whereas, in fact, the Vienna was not wrecked until the middle of February, 1906, and Sykes's report, which he is trying to discredit, is for the season commencing December, 1904, and ending June, 1905. These dates seem to have been overlooked by the whole bunch of Mobile knockers. Sykes makes report of the tonnage for the season commencing in December, 1904, and ending about June 1, 1905. The engineers come along and try to discredit it, because some of the boats carrying the tonnage were wrecked the year following. One is' tempted to say there are "interested parties" opposed to the improvement, who have been so careless of dates as to state facts which, in the language of Inspector Kennerly, "is not correct." It is due Major Jervey to say he was a new man, just come into the case, writing about a river he had never seen and making a report on data furnished

Some Mobile statistics as to cotton.

Year.	Mobile re- ceipts.	Total crop United States.	Proportion Mobile receipts.
1857-58	522, 364 704, 406 330, 000	3, 257, 339 4, 018, 914 13, 565, 000	Over one-sixth, Do, About one twenty- fourth.
1905-6	250,000	11, 315, 000	About one twenty second.

During the period 1857, 1858, and 1859 practically all of Mobile's cotton arrived by river and went out by sea.

The Engineer says "that one-fifteenth of the cotton crop now is raised in the Tombigbee Valley." With a river every day of the three hundred and sixty-five the rate on cotton within 250 miles of Mobile, north and northeast, which embraces the Tombigbee River, would be $1.25 per bale less than now. So that it would save the people approximately $1,000,000, and the "port receipts" of Mobile, instead of being as now from 250,000 bales to 350,000 bales, would be nearer 1,000,000 bales. Mobile is the natural port of this section of the country, and with the river the railroads would find it hard to make a rate to any other port in competition with Mobile on account of the distance and service performed, and therefore could not divert the cotton from this port. Then Mobile would come into "her own."

Taking the figures of one of her commercial bodies, the exports of Mobile in 1894, when her harbor had a depth of 17 feet, were only $3.476,000; but in 1906, with a depth of 22 feet, the value was $26,575,000, practically all of which was cotton, its products, and lumber coming out of the Tombigbee and Alabama river valleys. Three-fifths of the South's cotton is exported. Why should not that of the Tombigbee Valley go again via Mobile, as it did prior to 1860? Rates to Mobile on cotton by river have almost always been $1 per bale, whereas rates by rail have almost always been about $2.25 per bale. The result has been that when the boats were put out of the running the cotton has been diverted from Mobile and gone to other ports. In this way the Tombigbee River has been made to run upstream, while the railroads carried commerce from Mobile and gone to other ports.

The increase in 1804 to $3.476,000, the equivalent of about 70,000 bales of cotton. If the river had been kept in the running by improvements, so that lines of steamboats could have been established to run the year round, Mobile would to-day be handl sympathy with the struggling thousands back of her in the interior. The increase in population and enormous increase in products have overtaken and overcropped all the railroads of the United States, and congestion prevails everywhere. The cotton crop a few years back was only 5,000,000 bales, whereas to-day it is 13,000,000. In a greater ratio has the country otherwise multiplied its products. The railroads can not do the business, and the sentiment is universal that Congress should improve the waterways of our country rather than check the prosperity which is dependent upon transportation.

What Captain Craighill, United States engineer, wrote of the Tombigbee Valley in 1903, was true then; its development is more important to-day. Here is his letter:

ENGINEER OFFICE, UNITED STATES ARMY.

ENGINEER OFFICE, UNITED STATES ARMY, Mobile, Ala., October 29, 1903.

Mr. John P. Mayo, Columbus, Miss.

Yours, truly,

Columbus, Miss.

Dear Sir: I have just received your letter of the 27th. I am sorry you did not arrange to make the trip down the river with us. We had line weather and were pleasantly entertained along the route.

I found the river larger than I expected, and its physical conditions appear very favorable for improvement by locks and dams. The valley of the river is immensely fertile and productive, and is urgently in need of better transportation facilities. It would seem that the saving in freight rates on the average annual amount of cotton that would be influenced by river transportation would pay a reasonable interest on the investment required for the improvement, although this feature of the case is one that requires, for a definite determination, more time than I have been able to give to it.

Yours, truly,

W. E. Craighille,

W. E. CRAIGHILL, Captain, Corps of Engineers.

But, all this quibble over figures and surplusage of statistics aside, the question is not whether the tonnage of the river is satisfactory now in its present half-year, uncertain navigation, but whether the people of the Tombigbee Valley are to have an outlet, not so much for its cotton at reduced rates, but for its undeveloped resources of lime, lumber, and cement, which it now holds locked up in inexhaustible quantities—commodities which the world needs, but which can not be marketed for lack of cheap and certain transportation.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, if the ancient mound builders had exercised their activities along the banks of the Mississippi River from the mouth of the Ohio down to the Gulf of Mexico and had piled as much earth along that stream as they did in various other sections of these United States, the present age would be under much greater obligations to them than it usually confesses itself to be; the mystery of why they did it would not be so perplexing, and perhaps the keen desire to know who they were would permeate the breasts of others besides archæologists and ethnologists. Since, however, those ancient denizens of this fair domain failed to seize that opportunity for making later peoples their debtors, it has been left to a more modern and, it is hoped, a more historic race to perform a work which has about it equally as much of "that poetic mist which shrouds the mounds scattered by the ancients in Ohio valleys" as have they, and in addition thereto has a practical, materialistic phase which, if possessed by the hillocks constructed by those mysterious people of the past, is shrouded in a for much denser than the poetic clouds. The levees and in a fog much denser than the poetic clouds. The levees and improvements of the Mississippi River are poetically materialistic or materialistically poetic, just as your paradox hunter may choose, but the material aspect is probably most interesting to most people.

The construction of levees along the Mississippi River for protection against high waters has been under way for nearly or quite two-thirds of a century. In parts of Louisiana it may have begun farther back than that. The early work was carried on wholly by the States or communities bordering on the stream, the money for the purpose being raised in different ways. A good many thousands of good dollars have been expended on projects which subsequently had to be abandoned on account of the shifting of the current or channel, but usually even the temporary protection afforded has more than repaid all such expenditures

It was not until after 1879 that the Federal Government began to lend aid to the work—in fact, but little aid for protective purposes was given until after 1890. The General Government began the work for the purpose of improving the navigation of the stream, the theory being advanced that by the construction of levees, wing dams, and jettles, so as to give direction to the current and restrain the waters in times of flood within a narrow space, the additional force given by the weight of the waters would scour the channel and prevent the formation of bars by the deposit of sediment. This theory had been suc-cessfully applied by Capt. James B. Eads in opening and keeping open a deep channel through the South Pass of the Mississippi River from the head of that pass to the Gulf. This distinguished engineer, born in Indiana in 1820, became a clerk on a steamboat running on the Mississippi River in 1839. many years he studied engineering problems, particularly those relating to navigation on that river.

From 1867 to 1874 he was engaged in the construction of the great steel-arch bridge that bears his name which spans the river at St. Louis. After successfully completing this magnificent structure he turned his attention to the matter of providing a ship channel from New Orleans to the Gulf. This project was receiving the attention of the Federal Government, and at the first session of the Forty-third Congress (in 1874) the appointment of a commission of engineers to make surveys and report a plan and probable cost of its consummation was authorized. This report was made to the second session of that Congress. In the meantime Captain Eads had been studying the problem for himself, and he appeared at this session and proposed to accomplish the work for considerably less than the amount estimated by the commission, and proposed to do it at his own risk—that is, to receive no pay unless he succeeded. By act of March 3, 1875, his proposition was accepted, and he was authorized to proceed. This he did, and succeeded to the full extent of his expectations. It was the crowning engineering feat of his life—one of the greatest of the century. His success in that un-dertaking led to the question being propounded, Why could the theory not be successfully applied to the entire river? Eads declared that it could. This opinion, coming from one who had so abundantly proven his faith by his works, naturally had great weight, sufficient, in fact, to determine Congress to under-The first step taken was the creation of a permanent commission, to be known as the "Mississippi River Commission," this being done by act of June 18, 1879. It consists of seven members, "three of whom shall be selected from the Engineer Corps of the Army, one from the Coast and Geodetic Survey, and three from civil life, two of whom shall be civil engineers."

It was made the duty of the Commission in the act creating it-

To take into consideration and mature such plan or plans and estimates as will correct, permanently locate, and deepen the channel and protect the banks of the Mississippi River; improve and give safety and ease to the navigation thereof; prevent destructive floods; promote and facilitate commerce, trade, and the postal service.

The actual execution of the work has been provided for from time to time in the bills making appropriations therefor.

The bill creating the Commission met with but slight opposition in Congress, only eleven votes being east against it in the House and four in the Senate. One of the advocates of the bill in the House was the Hon. James A. Garfield. His brief speech in support of it deserves to rank with any of his efforts for pure, chaste English and eloquent phrase. He pointed out the fact that it was to secure control of the Mississippi River that Jefferson strained his conceptions of the Constitution to purchase Louisiana from France and stated that if there had been no other reason for the Northern Army doing battle against the Southern Confederacy the importance of having freedom of navigation over the lower Mississippi River would have compelled them to it. One paragraph of the speech is as follows:

I believe that one of the grandest of our national interests—one that is national in the largest material sense of that word—is the Mississippi River and its navigable tributaries. It is the most gigantic single natural feature of our continent, far transcending the glory of the ancient Nile or of any river on the earth. The statesmanship of America must grapple the problem of this mighty stream. It is too vast for any State to handle; too much for any authority less than the nation itself to manage. And I believe the time will come when the liberal minded statesmanship of this country will devise a wise and comprehensive system that will harness the powers of this great river to the material interests of America, so that not only all the people who live on its banks and the banks of its confinents, but all the citizens of the Republic, whether dwellers in the central valley or on the slope of either ocean, will recognize the importance of preserving and perfecting this great natural bond of national union between the North and South—a bond to be so strengthened by commerce and intercourse that it can never be severed.

It should be borne in mind that prior to this time, with the exception of the work of Captain Eads, practically nothing had been done by the Federal Government for the improvement of the Mississippi River, particularly what is called "the lower river;" that is, from the mouth of the Ohio down.

Proceeding on the Eads theory two levees were constructed. One was in Lauderdale County, Tenn., known as the "Plum Point reach levee," extending from the town of Ashport to near Old Fort Pillow, famed in the war of secession as the scene of many military exploits, chief of which was its capture by the Confederate General Forrest with his cavalry in 1864. The other was the Lake Providence reach levee, above Vicksburg, in Mississippi. The results obtained from these were entirely satisfactory to the Commission, but about the time of their completion an event occurred which put an end to general levee construction for keeping channels open. This was the invention of the hydraulic dredge, which first proved its efficiency in the harbor at San Francisco. After experiments had demonstrated the utility of this method, the Commission, acting under authority given by Congress, had a number of these modern dredge boats constructed, and they have since been utilized, levees being constructed merely to preserve the banks and revetment and riprap work to prevent caving.

In the meantime sentiment had been growing for participation by the Federal Government in levee construction for the protection of lands from floods or overflow. It was insisted that the river belonged to the Government, was wholly subject to its control, and that the Government might very properly keep its property off that of the people. This sentiment received the indorsement of Congress, and since 1890 allotments have been made by the Commission, subject to approval by the Chief of Engineers of the War Department, to local levee boards. appropriation for specific projects are made by Congress (except occasionally a survey is specifically ordered), but a lump sum is appropriated and turned over to the Commission for allotment. The usual amount for several years past has been $2,000,000 per annum, of which ordinarily one million has been devoted to channel work and one million to protective levees.

The Commission has permanent headquarters at St. Louis, Mo., and usually two inspection trips are made each year from that point to New Orleans—one in the spring and one in the fall. Notice of these trips is sent out in advance to officials of the State or local levee boards, and these officials meet the Commission at various points along the river and present their claims for allotments. The basis of these allotments, to quote the statement of Col. O. H. Ernst, president of the Commission, is "their (that is, the local levee projects) needs largely, and a little bit according to their desire to help." The Commission has never initiated any protective levee. State or local boards must first take up the matter and begin the work, and the Commission, if it deems it worthy, will then give aid.

For convenience in administration the river is divided by the Commission into four engineer districts. These divisions are with reference to the channel work. For the protective levy work the engineer districts are subdivided into levee districts, and in letting contracts for construction these latter are further subdivided into sections. All United States levee work is under the general control of the engineer in charge of the engineer district in which located. The grade of the levees varies according to the topography and drainage of the sections they are designed to protect. The Mississippi River Commission grade is 2 feet above the highest water mark, with a base three times the width of the crown, technically called a slope of 3 on 1. In the system as outlined and projected to the close of the fiscal year, June 30, 1906, there were included 1,5101 miles of levee. When completed this system will contain 277,271,250 cubic yards of earth. Up to May 1, 1906, 205,877,020 cubic yards had been Of these probably about 60 per cent was placed by local in some districts more and in others much less. May 31, 1906, contracts had been let by various local boards for the placing of 3,698,238 cubic yards and by the United States 4,000,219 cubic yards, a total of 7,698,457 cubic yards. Much of this has been since completed, but exact figures are not available. The year 1905-6 was exceedingly unfavorable to levee construction by reason of the excessive rainfall and the quarantine during the yellow-fever epidemic, but little more than a third as much being built in that year as in 1904-5. The average cost of construction is 17 cents per cubic yard, the work being let by contract.

The total-amount expended on levees by the Federal Government below Cairo from July 1, 1879, when the Commission began its work, to July 1, 1906, is $20,612,317.06. This includes the expenditures for the early levees designed for navigation rather than protective purposes. The area of country protected by this system is approximately 27,000 square miles, or about 117,000,000 acres. The soil of the protected area is alluvial and very productive. Its actual value now is from thirty to sixty dollars per acre, and with the completion of the system it will be still further enhanced. Of course, large portions of these lands were in cultivation before levees were constructed, but practically all of them were subject to overflow, and millions of acres were wholly untillable. One of the largest and probably richest sections redeemed by the work is that of the St. Francis River Basin in Missouri and Arkansas, about 4,200 square miles, or more than two and one-half million acres. Very little of this was tillable prior to the levee work. It was swampy, marshy, and subject to overflow for 50 miles inland. With the construction of the levees, the basin has become a theater of bustling activity. Valuable timber in almost unheard-of quantities was rendered attainable and the exceeding fertility of the soil has Valuable timber in almost unheard-of quantities was made it one of the most valuable agricultural sections in the

So far only the longer stretches—that is, the larger basins and those which could be most easily cared for-have been leveed. Sections filled with tributary rivers and creeks present an exceedingly difficult engineering problem—one that at many places can doubtless be solved only by constructing wing or lateral dikes along such tributaries. The expense of this will be very great, of course, and that work will hardly be undertaken until the increase of population is such as to render the land absolutely necessary. There has been more or less agitation during the past few years of the matter of the Federal Government taking entire control of the levee systems and keeping it in repair. This may be some time done, but it is not at all probable until the system shall have been completed, if then. [Applause.]

FORT BERTHOLD MILITARY RESERVATION, N. DAK.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 24473) to define the status of certain patents and pending entries, selections, and filings on lands formerly within the Fort Berthold Indian Reservation in North Dakota.

The bill was read, as follows:

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all patents heretofore issued on entries and selections made without fraud under any of the laws providing for disposal of the public lands on lands formerly within the Fort Berthold Indian Reservation, in North Dakota, which were opened to settlement by the President's proclamation dated May 20, 1891, pursuant to the provisions of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1892, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1891, shall have the same effect, and all pending entries, selections, or filings embracing such lands made prior to December 1, 1906, shall be disposed of in the same manner and under the same restrictions and limitations, as if the lands included in such patents, entries, selections, or the public-land laws.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to have an explanation of this.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. Speaker, this bill was introduced at the request of the Department. The Fort Berthold Reservation was opened under the act of March 3, 1891, by a proclamation made by President Harrison on the 20th of May, the same year. The provisions of that law are these: The lands in question represents to extrement and entry under the harmstead laws. were open to settlement and entry under the homestead laws only; that when commutations are made under the homestead laws the price of $1.50 per acre should be paid. At this time the lands were unsurveyed, but after the surveys were made and approved, when the tract books were opened for recording, no notations were made by the Department, and they failed to instruct the local land office that $1.50 per acre should be paid instead of the price of $1.25 an acre under the general law. Now, they have been permitted to go on, and a number of proofs have been made and in many cases patents issued, and a great many entries and patents are suspended, and this bill is simple to convect the mistake made by the Downton. ply to correct the mistake made by the Department.

Mr. PAYNE. It is to allow the patents to issue at $1.25 per acre instead of $1.50 per acre?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes. Mr. PAYNE. Is it recommended by the Secretary of the Interior and the Land Office?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.
Mr. PAYNE. Is it a unanimous report of the committee?
Mr. GRONNA. It is a unanimous report of the committee, and we have letters from the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office recommending it

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. Gronna, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

LORENZO F. HARMON.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following Senate concurrent resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate concurrent resolution No. 45.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President be requested to return the bill (S. 1879) entitled "An act granting an increase of pension to Lorenzo F. Harmon."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the concurrent resolution?

There was no objection.

The Senate concurrent resolution was agreed to.

Mr. CULBERSON. I present as a memorial, by request, a series of resolutions adopted at the tenth annual convention of the American Live Stock Association, held at Denver, Colo., January 22-23, 1907, relative to car shortage. I ask that the resolutions be printed in the Record and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Resolution adopted at the tenth annual convention of the American National Live-Stock Association held at Denver, Colo., January 22 and 23, 1907.]

Resolution adopted at the tenth annual convention of the American National Live-Stock Association held at Denver, Colo., January 22 and 23, 1907.]

Whereas many of the railroads have failed to supply themselves with sufficient facilities to perform their duties as common carriers in receiving and transporting freight throughout the western half of the United States, where live-stock raising and feeding and shipping is a most extensive and important industry, and have failed to furnish cars in which live stock could be shipped to market to such an extent that tens of thousands of cattle and sheep could not during the past season be marketed, and have failed to supply cars for such great length of time after orders have been given therefor that a large proportion of the live stock marketed were so much delayed, generally for weeks and in many instances for months, that they lost seriously in flesh and condition, and after cars were supplied and live stock loaded have moved the same at such slow rate of speed and otherwise delayed shipments as to seriously damage such live stock; and *

Whereas this treatment of the live-stock industry of the country has been growing worse year by year and has cost the producers millions of dollars, reaching the appalling condition during the past season of forcing many shippers practically out of business, probably bankrupting some and seriously injuring and demoralizing the entire live-stock business, particularly in the Southwest; and

Whereas there are, as a whole, more stock cars and have been fewer shipments the past season than heretofore, and it is our belief from observation, experience, and from what we can ascertain that there has been a reckless indifference of the railroad management in the localities where this disastrous condition has existed in supplying themselves with stock cars or in utilizing what they have been able to obtain to transport live stock, either permitting the cars to stand idle, as has often been the case, or using them in transporting other traff

Whereas the refusal of railroads to permit cars to go off their own line and to deliver cars to other lines has to a great extent impaired the efficiency of the cars which should be available and placed it beyond the power of many railroads to secure cars or a return of cars or exchange of cars, and in this way demoralized the railroad stopped and the power of many railroads to secure cars or a return of cars or exchange of cars, and in this way demoralized the railroad stopped and the secure cars.

whereas it is our earnest belief, concurred in by all those who investigate the subject, that the free exchange of cars and the thorough and rapid transportation of live stock is the only way in which this unbearable condition can be relieved; and Whereas we believe that if left to themselves the railroads will not better conditions, at least not relieve them, in absence of some law which compels a free exchange and interchange of cars to enable each road to get back empty cars for loaded cars delivered to its connection, and a law which fixes penalties to compel the furnishing of cars to shippers and the exchange and interchange as between railroads; and to shippers and the exchange and interchange as between railroads; and

Whereas there has been introduced in the Senate of the United States by the Hon. C. A. Culberson. United States Senator from Texas, a bill (S. 7887) declaring it to be the duty of railroads subject to the act to regulate commerce to provide sufficient facilities to perform with dispatch their duties as common carriers in furnishing cars and transportation for shipment of all freight, including live stock, and to promptly transport same and to exchange loaded and empty cars and otherwise to provide sufficient facilities, fixing penalties for failure of such duties and giving to the shipper the right to recover in any court of any State or Territory having jurisdiction his damages and attorney's fees, and in case of failure to furnish cars for shipping live stock double the damages sustained, and also empowering the Interstate Commerce Commission to enforce penalties for violation of the act and to make rules and regulations with respect to the time and manner of giving notice for cars, furnishing cars, exchange and interchange of cars, and all needful rules and regulations in the administration of such law and to compel its observance, and providing rules applicable to the different classes and kind of freight and the varying circumstances and conditions of shipment; and

Whereas we believe that the enactment of said bill into law will speedily remedy the deplorable conditions herein set forth, and that some such measure is imperatively necessary: Now, therefore, be it Resolved by the American Live Stock Association in convention assembled at Denver, Colo., January 22 and 23, 1877, That we heartily indorse said bill and recommend to our Senators and Congressmen from all of the Western States, from which this association draws its membership, that the same be passed; and further be it to each of the western Senators and Congressment with the request that the same be read in both the Senate and House of Representatives as the expression of this convention; and be it further Resolved, That a copy thereof be sent to President Roosevelt as the expression of this convention, with the request that he submit to Congress a special message urging an enactment of such a law; and further be it be it Resolved, That said bill be printed by the secretary of this association and furnished the members thereof, with the request that they write their respective Senators and Members of Congress urging the enactment thereof.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CLAPP. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 22580) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments. Mr. CLAPP. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that the amendments of the committee be acted upon as they are reached.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota asks that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with; that the bill shall be read for the consideration of amendments, and that Without obthe committee amendments be first considered. jection, it is so ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, under the head of "General provisions," on page 2, after line 3,

COURT OF CLAIMS.

COURT OF CLAIMS.

Jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the Court of Claims to hear and report findings of fact to Congress in all cases where a claim is made upon the United States based upon an act of Congress diminishing or providing for the sale of any part of an Indian reservation.

Where said claim is made in behalf of an Indian reservation.

Where said claim is made in behalf of an Indian tribe it may be prosecuted in the name of such tribe.

Proceedings brought before said court, under the provisions hereof, may be instituted by filing a petition in the Court of Claims setting forth in a plain and concise manner the alleged claim against the United States, and such petition shall be verified by an attorney appearing for the claimant or claimants: Provided, That where an attorney appears for a tribe of Indians he shall, at the time of filing the petition, file the contract of his employment, after the same has been approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

Before filing such petition, the claimant or claimants shall, by themselves or through an attorney, file with the Attorney-General of the United States a statement or notice to the effect that the petition, a copy of which shall be attached to such notice or statement, will be filed in the Court of Claims, and said notice or statement shall state when such petition will be filed, and such statement, the service thereof being verified by the claimant or attorney, shall be filed with the petition, and upon the filing of said petition and affidavit of service of notice and petition will be filed, and such statement, the service thereof being verified by the claimant or attorney-General as above set forth, the Court of Claims shall have jurisdiction to hear said cause and report its findings of fact to Congress; that immediately upon filing said petition, the clerk of said court shall notify the Attorney-General that the same has been filed, and the United States shall have sixty days after such notice in which to make answer to said petition, and the su

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, I desire to raise a point of order against this amendment. I will withhold it if the Senator from Minnesota desires to explain the provision.

I did not hear the Senator from New Jersey. Mr. KEAN. I make a point of order against the amend-Of course, if the Senator desires to explain it I will withhold it for an explanation. It is clearly out of order. Mr. CLAPP. Well, we will see.

Mr. KEAN. I withhold the point of order for an explanation.

Mr. CLAPP. I doubt whether it would be out of order in this bill to authorize Indians or Indian tribes to go into the Court of Claims. Of course, that would meet perhaps with an objection that it would hardly be in conformity with the Constitution to put it in that form. So instead of designating Indians and Indian tribes we provide that the claims shall be based upon treaties or upon laws which diminish reservations, which of late years have taken the place of treaty provisions in the diminishing and the sale of Indian reservations.

This matter came to the chairman's notice through the request of the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. Morgan], who for some years has been insisting that there should be a provision of this kind enacted. There are a great many old claims pending in Congress, and the idea was simply to give the Indians an opportunity to go to a court. They would get no judgment, but they would get a finding of fact which would present their matters in concrete form before the committees and before the two Houses of Congress.

Mr. CURTIS. I should like to ask the Senator from Minnesota a question.

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly. Mr. CURTIS. Has the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate ever refused to permit any tribe to go to the Court of Claims where a proper showing has been made?

Mr. CLAPP. I do not know that it has, but when these claims come before the committee now they are in a chaotic state; it is difficult to ascertain the facts. If the Senate is willing on the recommendation of the committee to send a claim to the Court of Claims for a finding of fact, I certainly can see no objection to a general provision of this character.

It is a matter that I care nothing about one way or the other. At the request of the Senator from Alabama it was brought in here. The first thought was the creation of another court for the purpose, but on reflection and inquiry it seemed better to leave it to the court which we now have and simply give it jurisdiction of these claims.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

I understood that the Senator from New Jersey Mr. LONG.

made a point of order against it.

Mr. KEAN. I made a point of order against the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He withdrew it.

Mr. KEAN. I withheld it for a moment.

Mr. SPOONER. Let the Senator make it and reserve it. Mr. KEAN. I did reserve it, in order that the Senator from Minnesota might explain the amendment.

Mr. HALE (to Mr. KEAN). Make it now. Mr. KEAN. I make it now.

Mr. KEAN. I make it now. Mr. CURTIS. If the Senator from New Jersey does not renew the point of order, I shall do so. Mr. KEAN. I renew it, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. What is the point of order?

Mr. KEAN. The point of order is that it is general legisla-

Mr. CLAPP. I do not care what is done with the amendment. I desire to submit that it is not general legislation. It certainly applies to cases resting upon treaty claims or laws which have taken the place of treaties diminishing and providing for the sale of Indian reservations. If it is not appropriate in a bill to provide for fulfilling treaty stipulations, I hardly know what would be germane to such a bill. If the Senate does not want it that is another matter, and that I do not care to discuss.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is inclined to think that the point of order is well taken. The Chair sustains the point of the point of order is well taken. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill. The next amendment was, under the subhead "Secretary," on page 4, line 25, after the words "Secretary of the Interior," to in-"And the employment of such Indians and the hiring of their property, in connection with the construction of any irrigation project under the Reclamation Service, shall be exempt from the provisions of sections 3709 and 3744, Revised Statutes; " so as to make the clause read:

Statutes;" so as to make the clause read:

That no purchase of supplies for which appropriations are made herein, exceeding in the aggregate $500 in value at any one time, shall be made without first giving at least three weeks' public notice by advertisement, except in case of exigency, when, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, who shall make official record of the facts constituting the exigency and shall report the same to Congress at its next session, he may direct that purchases may be made in open market in amount not exceeding $3,000 at any one purchase: Provided, That supplies may be purchased, contracts let, and labor employed for the construction of artesian wells, ditches, and other works for irrigation, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, without advertising as hereinbefore provided: Provided further, That as far as practicable Indian labor shall be employed and purchase in the open market made from Indians, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior. And the employment of such Indians and the hiring of their property, in connection with the construction of any irrigation project under the Reclamation Service, shall be exempt from the provisions of sections 3709 and 3744, Revised Statutes.

Mr. LODGE. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee

Mr. LODGE. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee what the purpose of that special exemption is? Section 3709 exempts personal services from the general rule affecting public contracts, so that the employment of Indians for labor would not be interfered with. But when it comes to the hiring of their property, the exemption of section 3744 relieves the Reclamation Service from making any contracts with them at all. I should like to know why that exemption should be made in regard to property.

Mr. CLAPP. The idea was that there was so little of it. and it was the suggestion of the Department, if I recall, that that exemption should be made not only as to the personal employment, but also as to the property. On page 6 of the report there will be found a communication from the Interior Department. I will read it if the Senator cares to hear it. Mr. LODGE. No; it is all right. I merely wanted to in-Department.

quire about it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, after line 4, to insert:

The next amendment was, on page 7, after line 4, to insert:

That rights of way in the nature of easements may be granted to any citizen, association, or corporation of the United States by the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, through any Indian reservation, or through any lands held by an Indian tribe or nation, or through any lands held by an Indian tribe or nation, or through any lands held by an Indian tribe or nation, or through any lands reserved for an Indian agency or for other purposes in connection with the Indian Service, for sites for mills and other industries, for electrical plants, poles, and lines for the generation and distribution of electrical power, and for canals, ditches, pipes, and pipe lines, flumes, tunnels, or other water conduits, and for water plants, dams, and reservoirs used to promote irrigation or mining or quarrying or the manufacturing or cutting of timber or lumber or the supplying of water for domestic, public, or any other beneficial uses, to the extent of the ground occupied by such sites, canals, ditches, flumes, tunnels, reservoirs, or other water conduits, or water plants, or electrical or other works herein authorized, but not to exceed 50 feet on each side of the center line of such pipe lines and electrical lines, together with the rights to the beneficial use of the water from any spring, stream, lake, natural reservoir, or other source of water supply located on such lands.

Before any grant of right of way hereunder shall become effective full compensation therefor, including all damage to improvements and adjacent lands, shall be made to the Secretary of the Interior for the benefit of the tribe or nation, which compensation shall be determined and paid under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, in such manner as he may prescribe.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I make the point of order that Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I make the point of order that this provision, which is very important and which enacts legislation of great moment, is not proper upon an appropriation bill, it being general legislation.

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator will pardon me, my attention was diverted for the moment. What was the Senator's remark?

Mr. HALE. I make the point of order on the amendment, beginning in line 4, on page 7, in reference to rights of way through Indian reservations.

Mr. CLAPP. All I have to say to that is that it is recom-mended by the Interior Department. It provides only for the granting of rights of way through Indian reservations. The Secretary of the Interior could not grant any rights of way through allotments. So we eliminated allotments and reported the provision as recommended by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. HALE. It may be, Mr. President, that it would be proper legislation in the proper place—I do not go into that—but it is legislation on the general proposition of giving rights of way through reservations. I think there can be no doubt about that. The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota desire to be heard in opposition to the point of order.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I do not care to be heard. wish only, however, to make this statement to correct some feelwish only, however, to make this statement to correct some reging in the committee, where I am criticised somewhat for not resisting these points of order. It is no earthly interest to me whether these various amendments remain in this bill or not. They were prepared mostly under the direction of the Interior Department and then inserted in the bill. I am not going to stand here and contest them. I submit the question to the decision of the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair has examined the amendment reported by the committee and is clearly of the opinion that it is out of place on an appropriation bill. The chair, therefore, sustains the point of order.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I rise to inquire whether this is the proper time to submit amendments which the Department has asked to have inserted in the bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If the Senator refers to a committee amendment, it is now in order.

Mr. CLAPP. I do. Then I desire, on page 7, after line 4, to have inserted what I send to the desk.

Mr. HALE. In accordance with the general rule, as we have not had an opportunity to examine the amendment, I suggest to the Senator from Minnesota that he defer offering it for the present until the bill is completed, and then let it come in.

Mr. CLAPP. Very well. Then I will ask that the amendment lie on the table for the present.

Mr. HALE. And let it be printed.
Mr. CLAPP. It has been printed as reported from the committee having charge of the bill.
The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I desire to inquire as to what amendment the point of order was made by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It was as to the amendment beginning on line 5, page 7.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. And extending how far?

Mr. HALE. To the entire amendment. Mr. LODGE. To the end of line 10 on page 8.

The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, on page 8, after line 10, to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to pay any Indian who is blind, crippled, decrepit, or helpless from old age, disease or accident, his or her share of the tribal trust funds in the United States Treasury belonging to the tribe of which such Indian is a member, and of any other money which may hereafter be placed in the Treasury for the credit of such tribe and susceptible of division among its members, under such rules, regulations, and conditions as he may prescribe: Provided, That this authority shall not apply to any fund against which the United States has advanced money to be reimbursed from such fund, until such reimbursement has been made.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Commissioner," on page 8, after line 23, to insert:

In any case where the restrictions as to alienation have been removed with respect to any Indian allottee, or as to any portion of the lands of any Indian allottee, and such allottee as an individual, or as a member of any tribe, has an interest in any fund held by the United States beyond the amount by law chargeable to such Indian or tribe on account of advances, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is hereby authorized, prior to the date at which any penalties for the nonpayment of taxes would accrue under the laws of the State or Territory in which such land is situated, to pay such taxes and charge the amount thereof to such allottee, to be deducted from the share of such allottee in the final distribution or payment to him from such fund: Provided, That no such payment shall be made by said Commissioner where it is in excess of the amount which will ultimately be due said allottee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, line 8, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "forty;"

and in the same line, after the word "dollars," to insert "of which $15,000 shall be immediately available;" so as to make the clause read .

For survey and subdivision of Indian reservations and of lands to be allotted to Indians, and to make allotments in severalty, to be expended by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, $40,000, of which $15,000 shall be immediately

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, line 2, after the word "training," to strike out "under arrangements in which their proper care, support, and education shall be in exchange for their labor, seventy," and to insert "seventy-five;" so as to read:

For collection and transportation of pupils to and from Indian schools, and also for the transportation of Indian pupils from all the Indian schools and placing of them, with the consent of their parents, under the care and control of such suitable white families as may in all respects be qualified to give such pupils moral, industrial, and educational training, $75,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, after line 11, to insert:

The next amendment was, on page 12, after line 11, to insert:

That hereafter white children may, under rules and regulations prescribed by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, be admitted to any Indian day school: Provided, That the tuition fees charged for such children shall in no case exceed the tuition fees allowed or charged by the State or county in which such school is situated for the children admitted in the common schools of such State or county: And provided further, That all tuition fees paid for white children enrolled in Indian day schools shall be deposited in the United States Treasury to reimburse the funds out of which the schools last mentioned are maintained.

Mr. LODGE Mr. President I have no desire to compose that Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have no desire to oppose that amendment, but I do not quite understand its purpose. I should be very much obliged if the Senator from Minnesota [Mr.

CLAPP] would explain it.

Mr. CLAPP. The amendment came from the Department to meet this condition: That as we open these reservations unallotted lands are sold, and some allotments of land are sold to white settlers who settle among the Indians. There is a notable instance of it in our State. The Commissioner, while he has allowed the white children to go to the Indian school on the reservation, has no authority really to do so, and he felt that he ought to have explicit authority rather than to allow a continuance of the system without it.

Mr. LODGE. It does not after the schools in any way? Mr. CLAPP. No; it does not affect the schools. It si Mr. CLAPP. No; it does not affect the schools. It simply allows the child of the white settler to go there and pay the same as he pays in the white schools in the State.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, line 1, after the word "necessary," to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That while absent from Washington under such detail they shall receive in addition to their regular salaries an amount not exceeding $3 per day, to be fixed by the Commissioner of Indian Af-

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to call attention to the proviso on page 13, from line 2 to line 5. If clerks of the Department are to be detailed to different States for the purpose of visiting various reservations to look after the interest of the Department, they should be paid at least their reasonable expenses, and it seems to me that $3 per day is not an unreasonable allowance.

Mr. CLAPP. This provision does not go to the expenses of the clerk. This is in addition to his regular salary. He would receive his expenses as the matter now stands. I will say, in that connection that the Commissioner was of the opinion that such clerks should have extra compensation. The committee, on the other hand, was rather of the opinion that clerks confined in the Department here would not object seriously at times to taking a trip under special instructions to investigate matters; and if we pay their expenses, there is no reason why we should pay them an additional salary. So the committee reported in favor of striking out the additional salary.

Mr. CURTIS. But no additional allowance? Mr. CLAPP. Ob, no; not at all.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, after line 5, to strike

That hereafter all schools for whose support specific appropriations are made in any annual Indian appropriation act shall be classified according to the number of pupils appropriated for therein, as follows: Class 1, where such number is less than 100; class 2, where such number is not less than 100, but not more than 200; class 3, where such number is more than 200, but not more than 400; class 4, where such number is more than 400. The pay of the superintendents of said schools shall be fixed by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs on a scale corresponding to the classification hereinbefore directed, as follows: Superintendents of schools of class 1, not to exceed $1,200 per annum; superintendents of schools of class 2, not to exceed $1,600 per annum; superintendents of schools of class 3, not to exceed $2,000 per annum; superintendents of schools of class 4, not to exceed $2.500 per annum: Provided, That the foregoing provision as to pay of superintendents shall not apply to the school at Carlisle, Pa., as long as said school remains under the superintendency of an active Army officer: And provided further. That the pay of any superintendent who performs agency duties in addition to those of his superintendency may be increased by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in his discretion, to an extent not exceeding $300 per annum.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I desire to call attention to the fact that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs has asked for the retention of the provision as it passed the House of Representatives. His reasons for this are given on page 10 of the report, and it is only due to him that attention should be called to his views in this respect and to the reasons which he has given. Briefly summed up, the provision will enable him to make, in his judgment, a better classification of the teachers; but the committee, after considering the matter, decided, notwithstanding his reasons, to continue the old policy of Congress regulating the matter. I call the attention of the Senate to it so that they may have the benefit of the Secretary's views upon the subject.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, after line 21, to insert:

The next amendment was, on page 14, after line 21, to insert:

That the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is hereby authorized and directed to send a special Indian agent, or other representative of his Office, to visit the following-named Indian tribes: Choctaw, Pottawatomie (Kansas), Senecas of New York, Six Nations of New York, Pawnees, and the Sacs and Foxes of the Mississippi, for the purpose of conferring and negotiating and entering into a written agreement with each tribe for the commutation of the perpetual annulties due them under treaty stipulations; and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs shall transmit to Congress at its next regular session said agreements with such recommendations as he may deem proper.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was under the subhead "Miscellaneous," on page 15, line 13, after the word "employees," to insert "and all other expenses connected therewith;" in line 15, after the word "rates," to strike out "and all other expenses connected therewith; "so as to read:

Telegraphing, telephoning, and purchase of Indian supplies: To pay the expense of purchasing goods and supplies for the Indian Service, including inspection and pay of necessary employees, and all other expenses connected therewith: advertising, at rates not exceeding regular commercial rates, and for telegraphing and telephoning.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same clause, on page 15, line 22, before the word "thousand," to strike out "three hundred and fifteen" and insert "two hundred and ninety;" so as to

And for transportation of Indian goods and supplies, including pay and expenses of transportation agents and rent of warehouses, and warehouses for the receipt, storage, and shipping of goods for the In-dian Service shall be maintained at the following places: New York, Chicago, Omaha, St. Louis, and San Francisco, $290,000.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, at the suggestion of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, I do not insist on that last amendment, and I take the liberty of moving that the House provision be restored.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. KEAN. Then the amount remains at $315,000? Mr. CLAPP. Yes; it remains at $315,000.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Indian agents-Proviso," on page 20, after line 4, to insert:

No Indian agent shall be an Army officer.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, that is a very old matter to be in an Indian appropriation bill, and I make the point of order that it is general legislation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is clearly of the opinion that the amendment is obnoxious to the rule, and sustains the point of order.

Mr. CLAPP. Inasmuch as we have got rid of them, I do not care.

I offer an amendment, to come in on page 20, between lines 18 and 19, and ask that it be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota will be printed and lie upon the table.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, on page 20, line 6, after the word "The," to strike out "appropriations herein or here-after made for the salaries of Indian agents shall not take effect nor become available in any case for or during the time in which any active officer of the Army of the United States shall be engaged in the performance of the duties of Indian agent at any of the agencies hereafter named; and the;" so as to make the clause read:

The Commissioner of Indian Affairs, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, may devolve the duties of any Indian agency or part thereof upon the superintendent of the Indian school located at such agency or part thereof whenever in his judgment such superintendent can properly perform the duties of such agency. And the superintendent upon whom such duties devolve shall give bond as other Indian agents.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the amendment of the Senate providing that Army officers shall not be Indian agents having gone out on a point of order, are not the lines now proposed to be stricken out necessary?

Mr. CLAPP. I think the suggestion is well made and that the House provision should be restored. I move that the amendment be disagreed to.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was, on page 20, after line 18, to insert:

That the pay of any superintendent who performs agency duties in addition to those of his superintendency may be increased by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in his discretion, to an extent not exceeding $300 per annum.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 20, after line 23, to insert:

The next amendment was, on page 20, after line 23, to insert:

That section 10 of the act of March 3, 1875 (18 Stat. L., p. 451), be, and it is hereby, amended so as read as follows:

"Each Indian agent shall keep a book of itemized expenditures of every kind, with a record of all contracts, together with the receipts of money from all sources; and the books thus kept shall always be open to inspection; and the said books shall remain in the office at the respective reservations, not to be removed from said reservations by said agent, but shall be safely kept and handed over to his successor: Provided, That should any agent knowingly make any false entry in said books as herein prescribed, he shall be deemed guilty of a miss demeanor and, on conviction before any United States court having jurisdiction of such offense, shall be fined in a sum not less than $500 now more than $1,000, at the discretion of the court, and shall be rendered incompetent to hold said office of Indian agent after conviction under this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Arizona," on page 22, after line 3, to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to proceed and continue to allot lands in severalty to the Indians of the Moqui Reservation in Arizona, in such quantities as may be for their best interests: Provided, That the allotment hereunder made shall otherwise be subject to the provisions of the act of March 2, 1887, entitled "An act to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations, and to extend the protection of the laws of the United States and the Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes," and the amendments thereto.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Fort Mojave School," on page 22, line 21, after the word "Arizona," to insert "$33,400;" and in line 23, before the word "dollars," to strike out "thirty-five thousand" and insert "one thousand six hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

For support and education of 200 Indian pupils at the Indian school at Fort Mojave, Ariz., $33,400, and for pay of superintendent, $1,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Phoenix School," on page 23, line 6, after the word "Arizona," to insert "$116,900;" and in line 9, before the word "hundred," to strike out "one hundred and nineteen thousand four" and insert "two thousand five;" so as to make the clause read:

For support and education of 700 Indian pupils at the Indian school at Phoenix, Ariz., $116,900, and for pay of superintendent, $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 23, after line 15, to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to cause to be issued to the Indian school at Phoenix, Ariz., upon the request of the Secretary of the Interior, sixty Springfield cadet rifles, or other similar rifles, with the necessary equipment therefor, for the instruction of the pupils of the shool.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Truxton Canyon school," on page 23, line 24, after the word "Arizona," to insert "$18,470;" and on page 24, line 2, before the word "dollars," to strike out "nineteen thousand nine hundred and seventy" and insert "one thousand five hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

For support and education of 110 pupils at the Indian school at Truxton Canyon, Ariz., $18,470, and for pay of superintendent, $1,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, to come in on page 24, between lines 10 and 11, and ask that it be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. KEAN. Let it be read.

Mr. CLAPP. Very well; it may be read at this time.
The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from Minnesota.

The Secretary. On page 24, after line 10, it is proposed to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, use such part of the $300,000 heretofore appropriated for an irrigation system for the Pima Indians in the payment of such Indians' proportionate part of the construction of the Salt River project, and such funds may be transferred to the reclamation fund, to be expended by that Service in accordance with its rules and regulations, the Indians to receive a credit upon the reclamation charge assessed against their lands under the Salt River project for the amount so transferred.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, under the subhead "Sherman Institute," on page 24, line 18, after the word "California," to insert "$83,750;" and in line 21, before the word "dollars," to strike out "eighty-six thousand" and insert "two thousand two hundred and fifty;" so as to make the clause read:

For support and education of 500 Indian pupils at the Sherman Institute, Riverside, Cal., $83,750, and for pay of superintendent, $2,250.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs has called my attention to the fact that the amendment proposed by the Senate committee as to the Sherman Institute ought not to be made, and that we ought to restore the House provision. On conference with him I think that is correct. I therefore ask that the amendment be disagreed to.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LONG. I call the attention of the Senator from Minnesota to the fact that the latter amendment provides for the salary of the superintendent, and should be agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. It is my mistake. I thought the Secretary was reading on page 25. That amendment should be agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to. Now, the amendment at the top of page 25, beginning with line 1 and ending in line 6, I think, on conference with the Commissioner, ought not to stand. We ought to restore the House provision, and I move that we do so.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Lest there be a misunderstanding, the Chair will call the attention of the Senator from Minnesota to the amendments on page 24, under the subhead "Sherman Institute.

Mr. CLAPP. The amendment of the Senate on page 24, lines 18, 19, and 20, ought to stand. I move that the vote by which it was rejected be reconsidered, and that the amendments be agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote by which the amendment was disagreed to will be reconsidered.

Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, at the top of page 25 to strike out:

For addition to laundry, $2,000; For additional farm buildings and improvements, $8,000; For two employees' cottages, $6,000; For cement walks, curbing, and guttering, $5,000.

Mr. CLAPP. I move that the amendment be disagreed to. Mr. McCUMBER. Inasmuch as the committee proposed to strike out that provision, I should like the Senator to give an explanation why it should be reinserted now.

Mr. CLAPP. The Commissioner has submitted a very lengthy report upon that matter, found on pages 12 and 13 of the committee's report. It would seem from his statement that we had made a mistake in striking out the provision, as the buildings are needed. It occurred to me that it would be perfectly proper to accede to the suggestion and let the provision stand.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, on page 25, line 8, to reduce the total appropriation for the support and education of 500 Indian pupils at the Sherman Institute, Riverside, Cal., from $120,500 to $99,500.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, it seems to me that if we disagree to the amendment on lines 1 to 6, then we ought to disagree to the amendment on line 8.

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly. I supposed my motion included that, The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment on page 25, line 8.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, on page 26, after line 2, to insert:

For payment to the Indians of the Round Valley Indian Reserva-tion, in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior may direct, $503.50 for 402.80 acres of land, at the rate of $1.25 per acre, which lands were erroneously entered by homestead and other claimants while they were a part of the Round Valley Reservation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Colorado," on page 26, after line 10, to insert:

That legal and equitable jurisdiction be, and the same is hereby, conferred upon the Court of Claims to hear, determine, and render final judgment, with right of appeal as in other cases, in a certain cause entitled "The White River Utes, the Southern Utes, the Uncompangre Utes, the Tabeguache, Muache, Weeminuche, Yampa, Grand River, and Uinta bands of Ute Indians, known also as the Confederated Bands of Ute Indians of Colorado, against the United States," being Congressional, No. 11248, pending in said court by reference under Senate resolution dated December 11, 1903; and in rendering said judgment the court shall embrace therein the value of all lands whereof disposition has been made for cash, and also for lands which have been withdrawn from the public domain and set apart as public reservations or for forest or timber land reserves or for other public uses under existing laws or proclamations of the President of the United States, and for all sums due to the Confederated Bands of Ute Indians, the complainants in said cause of action, under the terms of the act of Congress approved June 15, 1880, being "An act to accept and ratify the agreement submitted by the Confederated Bands of Ute Indians in Colorado for the sale of their reservation in said State, and for other purposes, and to make the necessary appropriations for carrying out the same;" said action shall proceed under its present title and pleadings filed, with right of amendment, and shall be conducted by the attorney of record now appearing in said cause or by any attorney by him specifically authorized to appear, and the Attorney-General shall continue to appear and represent the United States, and in rendering final judgment the court shall fix the compensation of the attorneys on behalf of plaintiffs, not exceeding 15 per cent of the amount of said judgment, which compensation shall be awarded for said attorneys who have rendered actual services in conducting the said cause, upon a quantum meruit, in the name of the attorney of record in said cause, or any attorney by him specifically authorized, and shall be paid to him from the proceeds of said judgment by the Secretary

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the amount of money involved in this suit extends from nine to twenty-five million dollars, according to the statement of the Commissioner; that is, an award of from nine to twenty-five millions may be made. It is therefore a pretty serious amendment.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator from Massachusetts pardon me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.
Mr. CLAPP. This is an amendment which the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. Teller] pressed with a good deal of insistence. He is not able to be here to-day, and I would suggest that we pass it over.

Mr. LODGE. I am perfectly willing that it shall be passed over, of course. But I was going to call attention to the fact that the compensation of the attorneys, as arranged by this amendment, it is provided, shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States without reference to the award, afterwards to be reimbursed from the Indian funds, and that the attorneys could get 15 per cent of this claim.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President—
Mr. LODGE. I do not care to go into the matter further at this time, but will let the amendment be passed over.

Mr. KEAN. Let me ask the Senator a question. If it is to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, the amendment is clearly subject to the point of order?

Mr. LODGE. Absolutely.

Mr. KEAN. But I do not make it now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be passed over at the request of the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. CLAPP. I will-state that it is noted on my memorandum to call the attention of the Senate to the reasons which the Commissioner gives why this ought not to be allowed, and his reasons are printed in full in the report.

Mr. LODGE. Perhaps it might be well to have printed in the RECORD what the Commissioner says on page 14.

Mr. PATTERSON. What page?

Mr. CLAPP. On page 14 of our report. There is stated the Commissioner's objection to the amendment.

Mr. LODGE. Let the objection as stated by the Commissioner on page 14 be printed in the Record at this point.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be inserted in the Record.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The matter referred to is as follows:

The case concerned is pending in the Court of Claims, which was Instructed by Senate resolution No. 52, Fifty-eighth Congress, second session, to proceed as directed and report to the Senate.

If this proposed legislation prevails, the findings of the court will be morally binding upon the Congress, and an appropriation will have to be made to meet its judgment. But this item proposes to give authority to the attorney of record, J. M. Vale, to control the conduct of the suit and employ other attorneys for the plaintiffs, and authorizes the court to fix the compensation, not exceeding 15 per cent of the judgment, which shall be awarded to the attorneys "who have rendered actual services in conducting the said cause upon a quantum meruit," and the Treasury is to be reimbursed "from the funds of the Confederated Bands of the Ute Indians."

Now, Mr. Vale is not attorney for the confederated Utes, but only for certain bands. Other attorneys obtained similar contracts from other bands, and all appear to have "pooled their issues" so that each might be interested in every contract.

In the request for findings of facts and arguments submitted to the court the eleventh finding asked for shows four contracts, the attorneys being J. M. Vale, C. C. Clements, William C. Shelley, Kie Oldham, Adair Wilson and W. S. Peabody, and says: "The services so rendered to each of the said bands of Indians are identical, and the compensation moving from each thereof should be the same. There is allowed and set apart to the said attorneys 12½ per cent of the amount awarded to the said Indians in these findings of fact, which is the minimum compensation named in the said contracts." This item, however, proposes to raise the award to 15 per cent and let in other attorneys.

Furthermore, this bill proposes to pay the attorneys out of moneys in the Treasury, without regard to whether the Indians ever obtain anything or not. As the amount involved is from $9,000,000 to $25,000,000, it can be seen clearly that the attorneys will fare very well, no matter what happens to the Indians. The entire business should, in my judgment, be suspended till the case in the Court of Claims has been determined.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The reating of the bin was residued.

The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, on page 28, line 11, after the word "Colorado," to insert "$33,400;" and in line 13, before the word "hundred," to strike out "thirty-five thousand one" and insert "one thousand seven;" so as to make the clause read:

For the support and education of 200 Indian pupils at the Indian school at Fort Lewis, Colo., $33,400; and for pay of superintendent, $1,700.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 28, line 20, after the word "Colorado," to insert "$33,400;" and in line 22, before the word "dollars," to strike out "thirty-five thousand" and insert "one thousand six hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

For support and education of 200 Indian pupils at the Indian school at Grand Junction, Colo., $33,400, and for pay of superintendent, $1,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Fort Hall Indians (treaty)," on page 30, after line 1, to insert:

For nineteenth of twenty installments, as provided in agreement with said Indians approved February 23, 1889, to be used by the Secretary of the Interior for the benefit of the Indians in such manner as the President may direct, $6,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 30, after line 14, to strike out:

For nineteenth of twenty installments, as provided in agreement with said Indians approved February 23, 1889, to be used by the Secretary of the Interior for the benefit of the Indians in such manner as the President may direct, $6,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 30, after line 20, to insert:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 30, after line 20, to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to acquire by purchase or condemation on behalf of the United States all land in townships 4, 5, 6, and 7 south, range 40, 41, and 42 east. Boise meridian in Idaho, that he shall deem necessary in constructing a reservoir for storing water for the purpose of irrigating lands on the Fort Hall Indian Reservation and those ceded by the Indians of the said reservation, and also the lands, rights, and property which he may determine to be necessary to the success of any pian or project for the said purpose; or he may cause the enlargement to be made of any irrigating system in accordance with the laws of Idaho that circumstances may require.

Upon acquiring the site, as herein provided, the Secretary may cause the system determined on to be constructed by contract or otherwise, in sections or as a whole, as he may determine, and may sell the water right for lands in private ownership at not exceeding $6 an acre, but no such right shall permanently attach until all payments therefor are made. which shall be reimbursed the United States from the moneys obtained from the sale of water rights, and the Secretary of the Interior shall have full power to do all acts or make all rules and regulations necessary to carry out the provisions of this act relating to the foregoing irrigation system.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Indian Territory," on page 34, after line 16, to strike out:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to carry out the provisions of the act approved April 21, 1904, for the removal of restrictions upon the alienation of lands of allottees of the Five Civilized Tribes, $25,000: Provided, That so much as may be necessary may be used in the employment of clerical force in the office of Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

And insert:

On and after July 1, 1907, all restrictions upon the alienation, leasing, or encumbering of the lands, except homesteads, of all allottees of Indian blood in the Indian Territory, and all restrictions upon the alienation, leasing, or encumbering of all the lands of allottees not of Indian blood are hereby removed.

Mr. LONG. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee if-it will be agreeable to pass over the amendment beginning in line 17, on page 34, striking out the House provision and inserting the amendment down to the end of line 4, on page 35. It will probably produce considerable discussion.

Mr. CLAPP. In view of the discussion that it will precipitate, and it being Saturday and many Senators absent, I intended to suggest that it should go over. The two amendments should go together, because if the Senate does not adopt the Senate amendment then the House provision should be restored.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will lie over.

Mr. CLAPP. At this point I desire to offer an amendment coming from the Department. I move to insert, on page 34, between lines 16 and 17, what I send to the desk. I ask that the amendment be printed and lie on the table. It will be necessary if we reject the Senate amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The Secretary. On page 34, after line 16, insert the follow-

That the act of May 8, 1906 (34 Stat. L., pp. 182-183), entitled "An act to amend section 6 of an act approved February 8, 1887, entitled 'An act to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations, and to extend the protection of the laws of the United States and the Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes," be, and the same is hereby, amended by inserting the words "of the Five Civilized Tribes" between the word "Indians" and the word "in" in the last line of the third proviso; so that this proviso shall read:

shall read:

"And provided further, That the provisions of this act shall not extend to any Indians of the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory"

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, on page 35, after line 4. to insert:

Ten thousand dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be immediately available, in the payment of indebtedness already incurred, necessarily expended in suppressing the spread of smallpox in the Indian Territory during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1901, all accounts to be first examined and approved by the Secretary of the Interior as just and reasonable before being paid.

The amendment was agreed to

The next amendment was, on page 36, after line 4, to strike out:

The Attorney-General be, and he is hereby, authorized to make all necessary arrangements for the transfer from the clerks of the United States courts in the Indian Territory and their deputies in their capacities as clerks and as ex officio recorders, to the proper State or county officials of the State of Oklahoma when organized, all records, papers, and files now in the custody of said clerks and their deputies, and he is authorized to pay the necessary expense incident thereto out of the excess of emoluments earned by said clerks and their deputies whether as clerks and deputy clerks or as ex officio recorders of deeds and other instruments during the calendar years 1906 and 1907, notwithstanding the act of February 19, 1903. (32 Stat. L., p. 842.)

And insert:

That to enable the clerks and deputy clerks of the United States courts in Indian Territory who are ex officio recorders to complete their records they shall be allowed to retain 50 per cent of the fees earned by them for filing and recording deeds and other instruments in addition to the compensation now provided by law.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I hope the House provision will be retained in the bill and that the Senate amendment will be rejected, because I am satisfied from a careful investigation that if 50 per cent of the fees collected are allowed, the clerks will be paid and permitted to retain a very much larger sum of money than is necessary to do the work.

The House provision simply provides that the Attorney-General shall pay out of the fees collected the expense of preparing the records to be turned over to the State authorities.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President-

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the junior Senator from Kansas yield to the senior Senator from Kansas?

Mr. CURTIS. I do.

Mr. LONG. I move in the amendment, in line 23 on page 36, that the word "fifty" be stricken out and the word "twenty-

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The senior Senator from Kansas proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The Secretary. In the committee amendment, on page 36, line 23, before the words "per centum," it is proposed to strike out "fifty" and insert "twenty-five."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the amendment? Mr. LODGE. There is no objection to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If not, the amendment is agreed to. Mr. LODGE. I wish to be heard on the amendment. I do not want to interrupt the Senator from Kansas.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. No; I do not desire the Senator to yield. I will speak when he is through.

Mr. CURTIS. I still insist that the House provision is the better of the two, and I hope it will be retained and that the Senate amendment will be rejected. I think it is sufficient to provide that the Attorney-General shall pay the expense out of the fees collected.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President-

Mr. CURTIS. I might say further, if the Senator from Wyoming will pardon me, that I have gathered statistics showing the amount of the fees collected last year. I have a letter from one of them wherein it is stated that the amount col-I have a letter lected by him last year was about $6,000; of this he was paid $1,800 for doing the work, and this year he states the receipts will amount to about $15,000 for that one office. It would be too much to permit the clerk to retain one-half or even 25 per cent of $15,000.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I wish to make an inquiry of the Senator from Kansas or from the Senator from Minnesota in regard to the basis for any action of this sort. I understand it to be the case that the recorders in the Indian Territory are very greatly behind in their work and that it is impossible, with the allowance made at this time, to bring their work up to date; that there will have to be additional help employed in their offices if the records are to be made complete for transfer to the new State officials. In the House text-I have not paid attention to it before-there is no provision for the performance of There is nothing provided for the employment this extra work. of extra help to bring the work up to date.

Mr. CURTIS. The Senator will observe that the House provision reads:

The Attorney-General be, and he is hereby, authorized to make all necessary arrangements for the transfer from the clerks of the United States courts in the Indian Territory and their deputies in their capacities as clerks and as ex officio recorders, to the proper State or county officials of the State of Oklahoma when organized, all records, papers, and files now in the custody of said clerks and their deputies, and he is authorized to pay the necessary expense incident thereto out of the excess of emoluments earned by said clerks and their deputies whether as clerks and deputy clerks or as ex officio recorders of deeds and other instruments during the calendar years 1906 and 1907, notwithstanding the act of February 19, 1903 (32 Stat. L., S42).

He is authorized to use for that purpose the money that may be collected.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I know, but that does not authorize the Attorney-General to employ additional help to complete the records. It allows the Attorney-General to transfer the unrecorded documents, while the purpose of the amendment, as I understand, is that the unrecorded documents may all be recorded and that the work of the offices shall be complete and finished at the time when the transfer is made. If I am wrong,

I desire to be corrected.

Mr. CLAPP. The correspondence on this subject will be found on pages 25 and 26 of the report. It appears from this correspondence that the clerks there were obliged to employ additional help; and the letter of Mr. Sponsler, deputy employ the United States court, is found on page 26. The matter was submitted to the Department, and while the Commissioner of Indian. Affairs, as will be found on page 26, does not particularly champion the provision, he says that he sees no objection to it. On the strength of the correspondence and conference with him the clause was put in here. I think the senior Senator from Kansas is quite familiar with the subject.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, this, too, is an old friend. It appeared last year. It was very fully discussed by the Senate and, as I recollect, was thrown out. It seems to me that if it is necessary merely to bring up the records, it is perfectly easy—if there is any doubt about the House provision—to give the Attorney-General authority to employ additional clerks in order to complete the records.

Mr. CURTIS. That is what I desire to do. I was just preparing an amendment of that sort.

Mr. LODGE. I think that will cover it entirely.

Mr. CURTIS. I suggest that the Senator from Massachusetts submit an amendment to that effect.

Mr. LODGE. I would rather the Senator would do so. He is more familiar with the subject. The provision offered by the Senate committee makes a very large gift to these clerks. We had precisely the same effort on the part of the clerks last year. I do not blame them. There is no reason why they should not try to get as much money as they can. But that does not bind us to give it if we do not think it is proper to give it to them.

I should think the amendment suggested by the Senator would cover the point and make the records good, and then we could abandon this proposition to give a bonus to the clerks for doing their work.

Mr. LONG. I believe it is necessary, and I think the Senator from Massachusetts will agree with me when he understands the situation, that there should be additional compensation to the clerks and deputy clerks, so that they may prepare their records for transfer to the State authorities, who will take charge of them on or about the 1st of July of this year. The House provision does not adequately provide for them, and for that reason the committee reported this provision. There should be only adequate compensation.

Mr. LODGE. I see the force of the Senator's proposition, to bring the records up to the proper point, and I have not the least objection to providing for it; but I think the way to provide for it is to include the necessary phraseology—that the Attorney-General be authorized to employ such assistants or such clerks as may be necessary to bring the records up before their transfer—and not put in a clause giving the clerks outright a large sum of money, which may be—and certainly in the in-stance cited by the junior Senator from Kansas would be—very largely in excess of the value of the labor to be performed.

Mr. CLAPP. I suggest that we pass this matter over momentarily, while the Senator prepares his amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be passed over.

The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, at the top of page 37, to insert:

at the top of page 31, to lineert:

The clerks of the United States courts in Indian Territory, and their deputies, shall be required to record all leases of Indian lands in Indian Territory, for whatever purpose leased, which require the approval of the Secretary of the Interior when such leases are offered for filing and record to such clerks or deputies, notwithstanding they may be offered for such filing and recording prior to their approval, and if said lease is approved such approval may be recorded. If such lease is disapproved, such disapproval shall be recorded by the Secretary of the Interior, and in such case the previous record of such lease shall be of no force or effect.

I desire to call attention to the fact that the Mr. CLAPP. Commissioner has reported adversely to this provision, and his report will be found on page 26 of the committee report. He is of the opinion that this ought not to be enacted into legisla-I am rather inclined to think that it ought to be, perhaps, tion.

Under existing law, a lease may be made, and it has to be sent for approval. In the interim the allottee may make appli-cation to have his restrictions removed, and it may be that the latter application is disposed of by the Department before action on the application for the approval of the lease. There being no record of the lease, the rights of the lessee, of course, under the lease are lost if the removal of the restrictions is approved and the record of a sale made prior to the record of the lease.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President-

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly.

Mr. CURTIS. If the lease is filed with the Indian agent, under the rules and regulations of the Department, is not that notice to the world?

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I do not know. tion I am going to discuss before this bill is finished—as to how far the Department of the Interior by rules and regulations can affect property rights. I doubt very much whether the record of that lease affects property rights recorded in the office of the Indian agent at Muskogee. I know of no law that makes that a public record throughout the Indian Territory. If it does, that will settle the question.

Mr. CURTIS. May I interrupt the Senator from Minnesota? Mr. CLAPP. Certainly.

Mr. CURTIS. The Supreme Court has decided that formal proof of the rules and regulations of the Department is not nec-The court will take notice of them; and if the court essary. takes notice of them, then the world must take notice of them.

Mr. CLAPP. Undoubtedly the court will take notice of the rules and regulations of the Department, so far as the administration of the law by the Department is concerned, but when it comes to fixing the rights of people in real estate, on the question whether a record or not is a notice, I doubt very much whether any rule or regulation of the Department can defeat a man in his legal rights in property or give property to a man who has no legal right thereto. If the lease is recorded and it is not approved, by the terms of the proposed act it becomes null and void. It is a matter I care nothing about except for One condition in the Indian Territory to-day that is affecting the Indians as well as the white people is the instability, the uncertainty as to title to property and property rights there

Mr. CURTIS. May I interrupt the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CLAPP. In one moment. For that reason it seemed to me wise to fix it beyond any question. That is all I care to say about it.

Mr. CURTIS. Does the Senator from Minnesota think it would be wise to record unapproved leases?

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly, if the law provides that if those leases are not approved they shall be null and void. If they are approved, then no subsequent act of the lessor, no act of the Department here in passing on the application for the removal of restrictions subsequent to the approval of the lease, can defeat the lessee's rights under the lease, and if the Department rejects the lease and refuses to approve it, it falls of its own weight.

Mr. CURTIS. Unless the Senator desires to complete the amendment at this time, I hope it will be passed over. I am ready, so far as I am personally concerned, to go on at this I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. I have no objection to passing it to a fuller Senate. I think any matter that is to be voted on should be considered when there is a larger attendance.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be passed

Mr. HALE. I was not here when this question was raised. The amendment as discussed, I understand, covers only the text on page 37, down to and including line 12.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is correct.

Mr. HALE. It does not at all refer to the subsequent matter? Mr. CLAPP. Oh, no.

Mr. KEAN. That legislation is necessary on account of statehood.

Mr. HALE. The next?

So the Commission says. Mr. KEAN.

Clearly the next provision is legislation. It may Mr. HALE. be so desirable that no Senator will make a point of order, and I will not make the point of order if the Senator from Minnesota can show that it is really an indispensable provision.

Mr. CLAPP. I will make a statement concerning it.

not yet been read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, on page 37, after line 12, to insert:

That no election for city, town, or municipal officers authorized by the laws now in force in the Indian Territory shall be held under and in pursuance of said laws in the year 1907; and all persons heretofore elected to any of said offices now serving and performing the duties thereof shall continue to serve in their respective offices and perform all the duties thereof, with all the power and authority conferred upon them by the laws now in force in said Territory, until such offices are terminated by the laws of the State of Oklahoma or until the officers provided for under the constitution of said State are duly elected and qualified: Provided, That in case no constitution is adopted and ratified in accordance with the provisions of an act for the admission of Oklahoma and Indian Territory into the Union as a State, approved June 16, 1906, then said officers shall continue to discharge the duties of their respective offices until their successors are duly elected and qualified.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I have received yesterday and to-day some rather vigorous protests from the Indian Territory against this provision. I have not been able to examine them, and I simply suggest to the Senator from Minnesota that it might be well to let the amendment be passed over for to-day.

Mr. CLAPP. There is no question, of course, but that this provision is subject to a point of order. It simply shows that one mistake may lead to the necessity for another. Last winter on an appropriation bill, where it had no place whatever, there was a provision similar to this relating to Oklahoma, but by inadvertence Indian Territory was omitted. The result will be that unless some such provision as this is enacted into law they will have to hold all their local elections there this spring, and will have to hold all their local elections there this spring, and the adoption of the constitution, to be followed by statehood, will practically make that seem a useless ceremony. At the should be some legislation on the subject, but the objection I suggestion of the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes this amendment was inserted. There will undoubtedly be objection to it, because there are a good many people there who probably would like to be elected to an office between now and statehood; but whatever advantage it may give them, the Commission called my attention to the fact that we did this precise thing in reference to Oklahoma. I think it was done on the urgent defi-ciency appropriation bill. For that reason it was brought in and submitted to the Senate. Unquestionably it is subject to a point of order if the point is made.

Mr. HALE. I remember the debate that took place here on this matter, and so far as I am concerned I will not insist upon the point of order. Occasionally it happens that upon appropriation bills considered in the last days of a session provisions are so clearly in the public interest that no objection is made to their being incorporated in those bills. They are subject, if the question is raised, to a point of order, but in emergencies the Senate has always, under such conditions and under such admissions as have frankly been made by the Senator in charge of the bill, incorporated legislation into an appropriation bill. Recalling what took place at the last session, so far as I go I see the force of the proposition now, and I will not insist upon the point of order at this time. I have no objection to its going over.

Mr. STONE. I simply desire to have it go over.
Mr. CLAPP. I have no objection to its going over.
The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be passed over.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask unanimous consent to return to line 20, on page 36, what we were speaking about a moment ago, in regard to the clerks, and to submit an amendment to the Senate committee amendment beginning at line 20; so as to make it read:

That to enable the clerks and deputy clerks of the United States courts in Indian Territory who are ex officio recorders to complete their records they shall be allowed to retain for such purpose a sufficient per cent of the fees earned by them for filing and recording deeds and other instruments in addition to the compensation now provided by law, the amount so to be allowed and retained to be determined and approved by the Attorney-General of the United States.

Mr. LONG. I think that amendment covers the point and is satisfactory. I believe it is better than the House provision, which the Senate committee reported to strike out.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I think it is better in this respect.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Before the words "per cent," in line 23, it is proposed to strike out the word "fifty" and insert "for such purpose a sufficient;" and to add at the end of the paragraph, in line 25:

. The amount so to be allowed and retained to be determined and approved by the Attorney-General of the United States.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.
The next amendment was, under the subhead "Five Civilized Tribes," on page 38, after line 22, to insert:

An act of Congress approved April 26, 1906 (34 Stat. L., p. 137), entitled "An act to provide for the final disposition of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes in Indian Territory, and for other purposes," is hereby amended by striking out on line 13 the words "And the Secretary of the Interior shall have no jurisdiction to approve the enrollment of any person after said date" and inserting the words "And the Secretary of the Interior shall have jurisdiction after said date to adjudicate any and all cases then pending "in lieu thereof.

Mr. LONG. Lock that the appropriate hereof.

Mr. LONG. I ask that the amendment be passed over.

Mr. LONG. I ask that the american be passed over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be passed over.

Mr. CLAPP. Under the bill which we passed last year we provided that the roll should be completed, and not only the work in the Territory completed, but we provided that the Secretary should have no authority after the 4th of March to approve any roll. The chairman took it up with the Commissioner of the Five Civilized Tribes, and he states that he can complete his work before the 4th of March. The chairman then took it up with the Department as to whether they would be out of the way with their work, and it was at their suggestion that this amendment was put in.

Mr. CURTIS. Was the amendment prepared by the Department?

Mr. CLAPP. No, sir; it was prepared by the chairman, I think.

Mr. CURTIS. It seems to me that it is very broad.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator will allow me, it is clearly subject to a point of order. On the face of it, it shows that we passed general legislation last year to a certain effect, and this year it is proposed to declare precisely the contrary to be the law. I will not make the point of order if the Senator from have is to the language of the amendment. I think possibly it can be perfected.

Mr. CLAPP. That is quite likely. I hope the point of order will not be made, because in some form there ought to be some authority given. This may not be the proper form, but there certainly should be some authority to the Secretary to deal with this matter after the 4th of March, because the Department can not get through by that time.

Mr. LONG. I think that is true.

Mr. HALE. I do not make the point of order now. The amendment will go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be passed over.

The next amendment was, on page 39, after line 8, to insert: That the Secretary of the Interior, or his accredited representative, shall at all times have access to any books and records of the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee. Creek, and Seminole tribes, whether in possession of any of the officers of either of sald tribes or any officer or custodian thereof, of the future State of Oklahoma.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 39, after line 14, to insert:

CHOCTAWS.

CHOCTAWS.

That the Court of Claims is hereby authorized and directed to hear and adjudicate the claims against the Choctaw Nation of Samuel Garland, deceased, and to render judgment thereon in such amounts, if any, as may appear to be equitably due. Said judgment, if any, in favor of the heirs of Garland, shall be paid out of any funds in the Treasury of the United States belonging to the Choctaw Nation, said judgment to be rendered on the principle of quantum meruit for services rendered and expenses incurred. Notice of said suit shall be served on the governor of the Choctaw Nation, and the Attorney-General of the United States shall appear and defend in said suit on behalf of said nation.

Mr. HALE. As the law stands now there is no enthority to

Mr. HALE. As the law stands now there is no authority to the Court of Claims to consider this matter. A provision is incorporated here giving the court that authority. Of course that is a matter of general legislation. Unless the Senator has some special reason to show why this ought to be done, I shall be constrained to make the point of order against it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I wish to say a word on the point of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. This question of a point of order on every one of these provisions is constantly being raised or at least threatened, and I do not know but that it is just as good a time now as any other in the consideration of this bill to understand the force and effect of the point of order.

The Senator from Maine raises the point of order that it is general legislation, but he gives as a reason for sustaining his point of order that it is new legislation. I understand that the point of order can only be raised in a case where it is general legislation in the Senate. The House, I understand, has a rule that pertains to new legislation, but here it is general leg-

Then the question naturally arises, What is general legislation? Do we not understand general legislation to mean that which applies generally over the United States? It may in its application strike only specific subjects and subjects that are lo-cated in only one section of the country, but in order to be general legislation it must be of that nature that it will apply to the subject whenever and wherever it may be. The fact that it is new legislation, it seems to me, does not come under this rule.

We are dealing here with the relation of the Government to We are dealing here with the relation of the Government to Indian tribes. Almost every line in this bill is something that pertains to the Indians or to the Indian tribes. For instance, I call the attention of the Chair to the objection that was sustained by the Chair a short time ago, without any debate at all upon the subject, in which general power was given under an amendment for any members of the tribe to appear before the Count of Chairs and assert their rights. Court of Claims and assert their rights. We have again and again placed such a provision heretofore in these bills, and I understand it has been sustained as against the objection that it was general legislation. We have provided that the Indian having a claim against the Government may seek redress in the Court of Claims.

Mr. President, that is not general legislation, it seems to me. If we can provide by specific legislation that one member of a tribe may bring an action in the Court of Claims, does it cease to be special legislation when we say that a dozen members of the tribe may bring the action, or that every member of the tribe may bring the action? This, which relates to that tribe only, can not be general legislation, because it is directed specifically toward that tribe and to that alone.

I certainly want to understand on what ground the Senator bases the objection that every amendment that is new legislation will come under the objection which is provided in our rule as against any general legislation upon appropriation bills.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator has asked the question, and I will tell him what I think is the scope and effect of this rule of general legislation. General legislation covers almost everything that is not covered by private legislation. General legislation may be only applicable to a certain case, but if it is a change of the general law, it is general legislation. We do not use the term "new legislation," but "general legislation."

Suppose, for instance, that on an appropriation bill relating to the judiciary the Committee on Appropriations should incorporate in their report a provision that one judge in a single State should hereafter receive a salary not of $6,000, but of $10,000. While that is narrow in its scope and only applies to one judge, just as this applies to one tribe, it is general legislation, because it interferes with the general law and changes the general law.

The point that if any legislation applies only to a particular case it is not general legislation applying to the whole country is not good, and it has never been held by the Chair, in my recollection, that it is not general legislation. It is not the question whether it applies only to one tribe or one person, but whether it is a change of the general law, and I think my illustration We could not on an appropriation bill raise the salary of one judge on the ground that it does not apply to all the judiciary but applied to only one judge. It would be general legislation because it changes the general law.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The Secretary. Senate resolution No. 214, by Mr. Carter, that a duly qualified entryman is entitled to a patent for land,

Mr. CARTER. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I am not prepared at this time to go so far as to admit that any law which affects general legislation is of itsef general legislation. If that were true, we could scarcely put anything into an appropriation bill other than the mere appropriation and nothing else. Every provision that adds an appropriation—that even adds to the salary of one individual-would fall under the same objection, that it is changing the general law, because it does not contain all of a class. the Senator refers to a case that is in no wise parallel to the one against which he urges his objection. He premises with a statement that there is at present no law on that subject. If there is at present no law on the subject, then I should like to have the Senator tell me how it changes the present law, there being none upon the subject. But looking at the amendment itself, we find the following:

That the Court of Claims is hereby authorized and directed to hear and adjudicate the claims against the Choctaw Nation of Samuel Gar-land, deceased, etc.

There is no law on the subject-no general law, no special law. It adds to, it changes, no possible general law, and it specially applies to the single claim of one individual. Now, how that can be contorted into a meaning of general legislation is certainly beyond my comprehension.

Mr. SPOONER. May I ask the Senator a question?
Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.
Mr. SPOONER. Not disagreeing with the Senator's view, is it not out of order under subdivision 4—
Mr. McCUMBER. I have not considered that at all.
Mr. SPOONER. As a private claim on a general appropriation bill?

Mr. McCUMBER. There may be other objections to the amendment, but the objections that have been urged right along to these provisions have been upon the ground that they were general legislation.

Mr. SPOONER. I think a great many of the objections are sustained on that ground.

Mr. McCUMBER. Pessibly. Mr. SPOONER. But is not this amendment subject to the following rule:

4. No amendment, the object of which is to provide for a private claim, shall be received to any general appropriation bill, unless it be to carry out the provisions of an existing law or a treaty stipulation, which shall be cited on the face of the amendment.

Surely it is a private claim. There is no appropriation in the bill for it. It has no business in the bill under the rule. It is simply a proposition to confer jurisdiction upon a court to hear and determine a private claim.

Mr. McCUMBER. I had not examined that rule to see if it has application to this amendment. I was simply objecting to the construction that was placed upon the words "general legislation" by the Senator from Maine in his objection to this particular provision.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota ask that the amendment be passed over?

I ask that it be passed over

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be passed over. The next amendment will be stated.

The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, on page 40, after line 2, to insert:

on page 40, after line 2, to insert:

That the Court of Claims is hereby authorized and directed to hear, consider, and render final judgment, with the right of appeal as in other cases, in the matter of the claims against the Mississippi Choctaws of Chester Howe and Chauncey E. Richardson, or either of them, their associates and assigns, on behalf of themselves or as attorney in fact for services rendered, moneys and supplies furnished and expenses incurred for transportation, subsistence, clothing, and so forth, in the matter of perfecting the claims of the Mississippi Choctaws to identification and citizenship in the Choctaw Nation, as well as for moneys advanced to said Indians for board, clothing, drugs, medical attendance, teams, farm machinery and implements, seeds, improvements on allotments, to pay old debts in Mississippi, and other expenses of said Indians in getting established and self-supporting on their allotments. Said court is authorized to render separate judgments thereon on the principle of quantum meruit in such amount or amounts as may appear equitably or justly due therefor, which judgments, if any, shall be paid from any funds now or hereafter due such Choctaws by the United States. In determining the amount of such compensation for such services and expenditures, the court may consider all contracts or agreements entered into by said Indians with said petitioners. Notice of such suit shall be served on the governor of the Choctaw Nation, and the Attorney-General shall appear and defend the said suit on behalf of said Choctaws.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I make a point of order against

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I make a point of order against that amendment.

Mr. CLAPP. Before the Senator presses his point of order, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Commissioner, on page 28, makes his protest against the claims.

Mr. HALE. On page 28 of the report? Mr. CLAPP. Page 28 of the report.

VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas will state his point of order.

Mr. CURTIS. The amendment is general legislation, has no right upon this bill, and directly repeals an act of Congress passed several years ago which prohibited the Mississippi Choctaws from entering into any agreement of any kind or character providing for their removal from Mississippi. Congress also provided in the appropriation act of 1903 a sufficient amount of money to remove the Mississippi Choctaws from the State of Mississippi to the Indian Territory. This is a claim, and therefore general legislation, and it has no place upon this bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. It seems to me that the objection could be well taken under subdivision 4 of Rule XVI:

No amendment, the object of which is to provide for a private claim, shall be received.

But it does not appear to me that it is an appropriate objection to state that it is general legislation.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing to add the objection suggested by the Senator.

Mr. HALE. I understood the Senator from Kansas to include that in his objection, that it is also a claim.

Mr. SPOONER. He does now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that the proposed amendment is obnoxious to the fourth subdivision of Rule XVI, and sustains the point of order.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Choctaws (treaty)," on page 42, after line 13, to insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to place upon the books of the Treasury to the credit of the Choctaw tribe of Indians the sum of $390,257.92, balance due said tribe under articles 10 and 13 of the treaty of June 22, 1855 (11 Stat. L., 611), and the same shall draw interest at 5 per cent per annum.

Mr. LONG. I should like to have the chairman of the committee explain the purpose or object of the amendment and the

Mr. CLAPP. On page 29 of the report will be found a long communication from the Department of the Interior that covers the Potawatomies, Choctaws, Winnebagos, Sac and Fox, Seminoles, Kickapoos of Kansas, and Senecas of New York, in which he recommends that these sums be capitalized and be put in the Treasury and that provision be made that the sums shall draw interest. As each of them is reached in the index to the report, the reference is back to page 29, where the correspondence is found. The correspondence came before us in the form of a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury including the correspondence of the Interior Department, in which these capitalizations are recommended and the amount estimated in each case. If there is any further objection I will refer to that correspondence. It applies, however, I will say at this time, to all these tribes.

Mr. LONG. I have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. At this point I desire to offer an amendment, on page 42, between lines 13 and 14. I ask that it be read and printed and lie on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota proposes an amendment, which will be read.

The Secretary. On page 42, between lines 13 and 14, insert:

That upon the passage of this act tribal courts of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations shall be abolished and no officer of said courts shall thereafter have any authority whatever to do or perform any act theretofore authorized by any law in connection with said courts, or to receive any pay for the same; and all civil and criminal causes then pending in any such court in said nation shall be transferred to the proper United States court in said Territory by filing with the clerk of the court the original papers.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I am informed by the secretary of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. La Follette] that the Senator from Wisconsin left the city last night, not knowing that this bill was to come up to-day. The Senator's secretary tells me that the Senator from Wisconsin desires to have an opportunity to speak upon several points in the bill, especially as to those provisions relating to asphalt and coal lands in the Indian Territory, the removal of restrictions, and the question of the freedmen being entered upon the rolls.

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator from Connecticut will pardon me, I intended as soon as the amendments to which the Senator refers were reached to ask that they go over, and shall, of course, do so, especially in view of the consideration which he has stated.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, what was done with the amendment stated a moment ago from the desk?

Mr. CLAPP. That amendment was ordered to be printed and lie over.

Mr. LONG. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. Clapp] will be printed and lie upon the table.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, on page 42, line 23, after the word all, to strike out "thirty thousand and thirty-two dollars and eighty-nine" and insert "four hundred and twenty thousand two hundred and ninety dollars and eightyone;" so as to read:

In all, $420,290,81,

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. That amendment, I suppose, is intended to conform the bill to the amendment just adopted.

Mr. CLAPP. It is. Mr. HALE. I un I understand that all these debatable amendments which follow, relative to coal lands, go over.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes; they go over. The VICE-PRESIDENT. Beginning on page 43, and going to the middle of page 51?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Beginning with line 17, on page 45.

Mr. CLAPP. The amendment as to the surface lands only extends to line 16, on page 45. The next amendment as to town sites ought to go with it, undoubtedly.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I think they should be considered as two amendments.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes; and they should both go over.
Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes.
The VICE-PRESIDENT. They will be both passed over.

Mr. CLAPP. The committee amendment on page 47, line 4, is the next amendment in order.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, on page 47, after line 3, to

That the city of McAlester, Ind. T., may legally issue, in addition to its present outstanding indebtedness, bonds to the amount of $175,000 for the purchase of sites and the erection of schoolhouses thereon, notwithstanding any provision of any law of the United States put in force and made applicable to the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, Indian Territory, limiting the aggregate indebtedness of any municipal corporation therein to a fixed per cent of its taxable property: Provided, That such bonds shall be issued in all other respects in accordance with section 55 of the act of Congress approved July 1, 1902, entitled "An act to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes of Indians, and for other purposes."

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, this amendment affords a particular instance in the line of the contention which I have made, that such a provision is general legislation. If the theory of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCumber] be true, it is not subject to objection, because it only relates to one city or one town issuing bonds. There is a general law that is recited in the amendment which forbids the issuance of any bonds of this kind; and that is the law to-day. Now, it is sought here to change that law, to substitute another law, authorizing a single city to issue bonds; and I suppose the Senator would say that it is not general legislation because it applies to only one town. I make the point of order on the amendment.

Mr. LONG. This paragraph is very important and very necessary. I hope, therefore, the Senator from Maine will with-hold his point of order and let the paragraph go over for to-day.

Mr. HALE. Certainly, Mr. President, I withhold the point of order and will allow the amendment to go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, on page 47, after line 18, to insert:

That there shall be assigned to the several members of the tribes of Indians known as the Creeks, Cherokees, Chickasaws, and Choctaws, respectively, who have not heretofore accepted allotments, 160 acres of land, which said land so assigned shall include such land, if any, as the said Indians have, respectively, lived upon, occupied, cultivated, improved or inclosed, or have used as their homesteads, respectively: Provided, This provision shall not conflict with allotments heretofore made.

That all laws and parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. CLAPP. I move to strike out the last two lines of that amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to striking out the last two lines of the amendment to which the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. Clapp] directs attention? The Chair hears none, and they are stricken out. The question now is on the adoption of the remainder of the amendment.

Mr. LONG. I should like to inquire what is the purpose of this provision?

Replying to the query of the Senator from Mr. CLAPP. Kansas [Mr. Long], I will say that the object of this amendment is to meet the case of some of the Indians down there. They have refused to accept their allotments. They are about closing up the question of final allotments, and it was felt that it was only justice to them—without any reflection, I may say that they are perhaps the less well informed among the Indians—to assign to them their allotments before the balthe Indians—to assign to them their allotments before the balance of the property should be treated as communal surplus, to be disposed of under the law. The matter was submitted to the Indian Office. The only objection of the Commissioner was that in the original form of the act it provided that these allotments should be made notwithstanding other allotments had been made, and where the other allotments had been made, including improvements which Indians who refused to take allotments had made, the provision as it was at first to take allotments had made—the provision as it was at first framed and introduced by the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. Dillingham] allowed those allotments to be disturbed. As the Commissioner says, that would lead to interminable confusion, and in view of that the provision was changed so as to provide that it shall not conflict with allotments heretofore made.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, as I understand, the intermarried white citizens of the Cherokee tribe are members of the tribe. The Supreme Court of the United States, however, has recently decided that they are not entitled to share in the lands belonging to the tribe.

I will ask the Senator from Minnesota whether, under this amendment, it would not give to each of those intermarried white citizens 160 acres of land?

Mr. CLAPP. I am very glad the Senator has called attention to that point. I took the amendment as it was drafted by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], and simply struck out the part of the amendment that would lead to possible confusion. As I am not clear that it would lead to the result the Senator indicates, I would suggest that the amendment be passed over for further consideration.

Mr. LONG. It should be passed over, as it is very important that it should be thoroughly understood.

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly. The general idea as to those Indians ought to be carried out.

Mr. LONG. I have no objection to that, but I think the amendment as drawn is entirely too broad-

Mr. CLAPP. That may be.
Mr. LONG. And that it would include the allotment of land to the amount of 160 acres to each intermarried white citizen of the Cherokee Nation, when it has just been determined by the Supreme Court that they are not entitled to any share in the tribal lands.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, on page 48, after

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to transfer from the freedman roll to the roll of citizens by blood of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations the name of any person who is of Choctaw or Chickasaw Indian blood on the side of either parent, as appears from the examination records prepared by the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes under the act approved June 28, 1898, or any tribal roll, or any field card prepared by the Commission or the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes, and other evidence shall be taken only in cases where the identity or Indian blood of such person is denied by the tribal authorities.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the amendment that has just been reached covers a subject to which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Lodge], who is not just now present, has given much attention, and upon which he desires to make a point of order.

ask, therefore, that it be passed over.

Mr. LONG. I hope that the point of order will not be made against this amendment until it has had thorough discussion in the Senate. It is a very important amendment, which I opposed in committee and will oppose in the Senate. For the information of Senators who desire information on the subject, I call attention to Senate Document No. 257, of this session of Congress. It contains much information on this amendment as to its purpose, and the result of its adoption. I join the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] in the request that the amendment may go over.

Mr. HALE. That will be entirely satisfactory.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, there are two or three other matters in this proposed amendment.

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the Senator from Wyoming yield to me a moment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I do.

Mr. PATTERSON. I should like an understanding that the last amendment which went over will not be called up until Monday; that it go over for to-day.

Mr. HALE. That is the understanding.

Mr. PATTERSON. It was not mentioned how long it would go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will go over for the day.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President—

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator from Wyoming yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I think I shall have to make my request, and then I will yield.

In connection with the request just made, there are two or three matters that are kindred to this which have been made subject to a point of order. The provisions from line 5 on page 48—the amendment which has just been reached—to the end of line 9 on page 52 in that respect are open to probably the same objections, and I ask that they all be passed over for the present.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, while I have no objection to the amendment going over, if we are going to take the entire time in reading the bill, I can see no objection to its being discussed at this time. There are perhaps at least five or six Senators here who will wish to discuss that provision. I am myself opposed to it. I voted against it in committee, and gave notice at the time that I should oppose it upon the floor of the Senate. There are other Senators who will do likewise. While I hope the amendment may go over until Monday without being voted upon, still, if we get through with the reading of the bill and have time to discuss it, I hope we may take it up this afternoon.

Mr. LONG. I think that the amendment should go over for to-day.

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly. Mr. LONG. There are several Senators interested in the amendment who are not present and who understood it would not be called up to-day.

The document to which I referred has only within the last hour come into the document room of the Senate, and several Senators who are interested in this amendment desire an opportunity to examine the document before taking up the amendment. But, before it is passed over, I desire to have printed in the RECORD, without reading, a letter from a Choctaw Indian relating to this amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas asks that the communication submitted by him may be printed in the Without objection, permission is . RECORD without reading. granted.

The letter referred to is as follows:

THE BUREAU OF CATHOLIC INDIAN MISSIONS, Washington, D. C., February 1, 1907.

Hon. CHESTER I. LONG, . United States Senate.

My Dear Senator. On page 48, beginning with line 5, of the Indian appropriation bill, just reported to the Senate, is an item which has only recently come to my notice. I inclose a letter in reference to this item which I have to-day received from Mr. Victor M. Locke, jr., one of the prominent young men of the Choctaw tribe, who is residing temporarily at Muscogee. It seems to me that Mr. Locke's contention is well founded, and I herewith inclose a copy of this letter, believing that it merits the attention of those who are to decide as to whether or not the item in question shall become a law.

Very sincerely, yours,

WM. H. Ketcham, Director.

WM. H. KETCHAM. Director.

MUSCOGEE, IND. T., January 28, 1907.

Muscoger, Ind. T.,

January 28, 1907.

My Dear Father Ketcham: I read a few days ago, with no little consternation, that an attempt was to be made by certain Members of Congress, or a committee thereof, to place the whole of our freedmen on the regular Choctaw roll. In the event of which, they would give our negroes equal rights with us bona fide Choctaws. I have no idea what you would think of this proposition, but I hope you hold the same opinion as myself—that is, that it would be outrageous. I can not conceive of such an injustice. I don't know anything about law, and I have studied very little the various treaties our people have entered into with the Government, but of the little I do know there is nothing that gives Congress the right to barter away our property in this fashion. Certainly there is no more riggered hours of a candary which is much more than the Government forced on the southern people after the war, and not only that, but our people have always allowed the freedmen privileges they never enjoyed elsewhere. We have always treated them as hundred times sooner look to us Indian people for compassion than from the ignorant and prejudiced from the States. We give them the friendship they do not get from the white people in this country, and they have been content. They themselves have made no further demands. If it is said that they have employed legal assistance, it is a white man's scheme from beginning to end. In that part of the country in truch I have the rear are more freedmen than any-roperty is to be arbitrarily held up and a portion of it divided among a people who have no right on God's green earth to the ownership thereof.

It is mine by right of an unbroken inheritance which reaches quite back into savage America. No man's title can be better than mine, can be so good, and I'll tell you it goes hard to be held up and affecced, and at the same time not to be able to help myself. In possession of my pro-rata part of my Choctaw inheritance I can hold my own here in Okiahoma and have a

Mr. CLAPP. I desire to call the attention of Senators to the amendments upon which we have deferred action for the present, and to say that in the report will be found the data for and against these amendments, together with the views of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, who objects to several of the amendments. I simply make that statement so that Senators who desire may examine it.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I desire to inquire whether a

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I desire to inquire whether a point of order has been reserved in any way against the amendment from line 5 to line 16 on page 48?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. A point of order was interposed, and the amendment was passed over.

Mr. STONE. Is the point of order pending?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The point of order is pending.

Mr. CURTIS. If the suggestion of the Senator from Wyonical agreed to I followed by a point of the senator from Wyonical agreed.

ming is agreed to, I desire to make a point of order against the other amendments.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I assumed that the point of order would be made, and to afford an opportunity to examine the report as to these particular propositions I asked that they go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments beginning in line 5, on page 48, and including pages 49, 50, and 51, down to line 13, on page 51, will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, on page 51, after line 12, to insert:

That the Court of Claims is hereby authorized and empowered in the suit involving the claim of the intermarried white persons in the Cherokee Nation to share in the common property of the Cherokee people, and to be enrolled for such purpose (being Nos. 419, 420, 421, and 422 on the United States Supreme Court docket for October term, 1905) to hear and report to Congress its findings of fact as to the amount which should be paid the attorney and counsel of record for the Cherokee Indians by blood in said suit, in reimbursement of necessary expenses incurred in such proceedings and as reasonable compensation for services rendered in said proceedings, said compensation not to exceed 10 per cent of the values in land and money saved to said Cherokee Indians, said values to be determined by said court. Such court shall further designate the persons, class, or body of persons by whom such payment should equitably be made, and the fund or funds held by the United States out of which the same shall be paid; and enter a decree for the amount so found.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I intended to include that amend-

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I intended to include that amendment also in my request.

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator from Wyoming also intended to include the amendment, on page 52, beginning in line 10, in regard to the loyal Creeks, did he not?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I intended to include all amendments where the proposition is to send claims to the Court of Claims.

Mr. KEAN. May I ask the Senator if they are cases already pending in the Supreme Court?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. None of them are pending in the Supreme Court. One of the cases, I believe, is pending in the court of the district, and is held up pending action by Congress or the adjournment of Congress without action.

Mr. CLAPP. I think all these amendments down to the word "Quapaws," on page 54, ought to go over until there is a fuller attendance in the Chamber, and I make that suggestion. Let it be understood that none of those matters will be brought up this afternoon.

Mr. HALE. All down to and including line 10, on page 54? Mr. CLAPP. Yes. Mr. HALE. That is right.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The committee amendments from line 5, on page 48, to line 11, on page 54, will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, under the subhead "Seminoles (Treaty)," on page 55, after line 14, to insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to place upon the books of the Treasury to the credit of the Seminole tribe of Indians the sum of $570,000, being in full for the amounts due them under the eighth article of the treaty of August 7, 1856 (11 Stat. L., p. 669), $500,000; and third article of the treaty of March 21, 1866 (14 Stat. L., p. 755), $70,000; in all, $570,000, and said amount shall draw interest at 5 per cent per annum.

L., 853), and the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to pay per capita to the members of the Pottawatomie tribe of Indians in Kansas the said sum, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by him and in the same manner as provided by the act of April 21, 1904 (33 Stat. L., 201).

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator in charge of this bill to the provision stricken out at the bottom of page 60 and the substitution therefor of the provision on page The House provision followed the course that has been pursued heretofore of the payment of interest on this fund. In this case, and in some others in the bill, the Senate committee has reported a proposition for paying over and distributing to the tribes, not simply the interest, but the principal itself. I wish the Senator would tell the Senate what are the reasons that moved the committee to this change of the policy that has been pursued heretofore. I do not know but it is right, but why now, instead of paying the annuity or the interest, divide the whole principal?

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, the reason for that is this: These three items relating to the Potawatomies, the Iowas, and, I think, the Osages, covered comparatively small amounts that were left and the distribution of the interest in many cases would not amount to what it would cost an Indian to go and get it. In the general process and policy of the Department of gradually clearing up these accounts, the committee, first of its own motion, without conference with the Commissioner, took these three matters-none of them involving large amounts, the largest, I think, relating to the Potawatomies and embracing $200,000, one $68,000, and the third, I think $90,000—and provided for the distribution of the fund without any qualification. Afterwards I called the attention of the Commissioner to what we had done. He thought it would be all right, but that we ought to have the restrictions that are contained in the act of April 21, 1904, which leave the Department some control over They would not pay them over to an Indian if they were satisfied he was incompetent to handle the money. So in these three cases, on the Commissioner's suggestion, we inserted that provision, leaving a sort of control over it, but still leaving the general policy to distribute, or giving authority to do so.

Mr. HALE. This cleans up all of them? Mr. CLAPP. This cleans up those three. The others that are submitted, I believe, have been capitalized.

Mr. SPOONER. This places the accounts on the Treasury books and cleans out the Indians.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President-

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly.
Mr. CURTIS. As I understand the Senator from Minnesota, it is not the intention of the amendment to direct the Secretary of the Interior to pay the Potawatomies this amount of money. If it is the purpose to require him to pay the money to the members of the tribe I desire to say there are some of the Pota-watomies who are not qualified to handle their share, while some of them are perfectly able to transact their own busines

Mr. CLAPP. I may state further, for the benefit of the Senator from Kansas and also the Senator from Maine, that our first provision was a direction to pay this money. On conference with the Commisioner we struck out the word "directed" and left the word "authorized." Then we made it subject to the provisions of the act of April 21, 1904, which the Commissioner assured me would be sufficient protection and leave the Department in sufficient control. I do not happen to have that in It was simply an informal conference we had on that writing. subject.

Mr. McCUMBER. As I understand, the amount that would be received by each of these Indians would be less than 60 cents.

Mr. CLAPP. In some instances; in others, it would be more. Mr. CURTIS. That can not be the case as to the Potawatomies and the Kickapoos, for they have quite a large amount of money paid them each year.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have reference, Mr. President, to the interest on the sum of $230,000, which would amount, in many instances, to less than one-half dollar to the individual Indian.

Mr. CLAPP. I think, Mr. President, with the provision striking out the word "directed" and leaving the word "authorized" and the reference to the statute, that the provision is a good one. At any rate it met with the approval of the Commissioner.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, on page 61, line 16, after the word "all," to strike out "twenty thousand five hundred and forty-one dollars and eleven" and insert "two hundred and thirty-nine thousand one hundred and two dollars and ten;" so as to make the clause read:

L., 540), and the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to pay per capita to the members of Sac and Fox Indians of the Missouri tribe entitled thereto the said sum in the same manner as provided by the act of April 21, 1904 (33 Stat. L., 201).

Mr. LODGE. I have no objection to the amendment embraced within line 20 to line 23, on page 70, but what follows after that, covering some ten or twelve pages, is an entire law, an elaborate piece of legislation, new legislation. I certainly, for one, could not undertake to pass on its merits by hearing it read from the desk without an opportunity to examine it. s open, of course, to the point of order that it is general legislation of the most extensive kind.

Mr. KEAN. It is ten pages long. Mr. LODGE. It is twelve pages long.

Mr. FRYE. Does its length make it general legislation?

Mr. LODGE. No; but it is an elaborate law for dealing with an entire Indian reservation, allotting it, distributing it, appraising the land that is left, dividing it, and selling it out to persons who may desire to buy. It seems to me general legislation of the most obvious kind. I make the point of order.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President-

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that a bill has passed the Senate at the present session identical with the provisions of which the Senator speaks.

Mr. LODGE. That, of course, as the Senator is well aware, does not make general legislation in order.

Mr. CARTER. I understand the fact to be that this is special legislation relating to a particular object and in no sense general legislation. The proposed legislation, even if subject to the point of order, which I do not at all concede, is of such great importance to the Indians and all the interests involved that the Department has repeatedly urged the opening of this reservation to settlement. It is the desire of the Indians that this legislation shall be had, and it is of very great moment to the northern part of the State of Montana that this vast region, the headwaters of the chief streams of that country, should be opened to settlement. The Indians are now leading a sort of nomadic life over broad areas, for which they have no special use. They fully realize that it is desirable that they should cease to be dependent and become settled upon allotments and attempt to become self-sustaining.

The amendment makes ample provision for the survey of the reservation, and that survey must of course precede the allotment to the Indians. The amendment allows each Indian 320 acres of land, 40 of which may be of irrigable land. For every man, woman, and child on the reservation this provision is made. There is no objection anywhere to the amendment, but a clear, often-expressed demand for its enactment.

I call the Senator's attention to the fact that in recent years no reservation upon which Indians resided has been opened to settlement, save and except through legislation incorporated in the appropriation bills from time to time. During the very last session we opened to settlement two reservations, I believe, and made the provisions in detail, as this amendment makes provision, for the final disposition of the land after the Indian allotments shall have been set apart.

In the light of what has become a custom in the Senate, to legislate on this class of questions in this way, considering the importance of this particular case, the Senator from Massachusetts, I am quite sure, upon reflection will not press any point of order upon this particular matter. I would prefer that he withdraw the point of order, with a view to renewing it later if, in his judgment, after a discussion of the merits it appears to him in the interest of good legislation that he should press it.

Mr. LODGE. I have no desire to press the point of order at this time if the Senator from Montana wishes to discuss the question further. As to the point of general legislation, I de-sire to say a single word. It makes no difference what the object is. If the legislation is a change of existing law or an addition to the laws of the United States, it comes under the head of general legislation. It has been so ruled repeatedly.

But, moreover, this amendment makes a charge upon the Treasury which is not estimated for, and it is liable to the point of order on that ground also. But I do not desire to press the point of order at this time if the Senator from Montana wishes to discuss the amendment, or if he would like to have it go over I will make no objection at all. I dare say the bill which has passed the Senate, to which the Senator from Montana alluded, is all right, and I have no doubt this is perfectly proper and a desirable thing to do, but I do not think it is a good way to legislate to put it on this bill. It seems to me a great deal better to put such bills on their passage on their merits, as the bill for this purpose has been passed, as the Senator says. I think it opens the door to a great deal of dangerous legislation if we load the appropriation bills with everything that there is.

Mr. CARTER. As I suggested, this clause of legislation has been passed by the Senate for years and years, without question as to the propriety, on appropriation bills, and if the Senate upon this bill concludes to reverse its uninterrupted policy, it shall be by a vote of the Senate to that effect. I do not wish to draw forth a vote this afternoon, because I apprehend it would inconvenience Senators to appear here in sufficient numbers. But before the matter is finally disposed of, I shall ask the Senate to determine whether at this time and place a policy heretofore unchallenged shall be reversed. I therefore suggest that the matter go over until Monday.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be passed over. The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, on page 83, line 1, to insert as a subhead "Nebraska."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 83, line 4, after the word "Nebraska," and insert "$50,400;" and in line 6, before the word "dollars," to strike out "fifty-two thousand one hundred" and insert "one thousand seven hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

The next amendment was, on page 83, after line 9, to insert:
That all claims of whatsoever nature which the Omaha tribe of Indians may have or claim to have against the United States shall be submitted to the Court of Claims, with the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States by either party, for determination of the amount due said Omaha tribe from the United States under any treaties or laws of Congress or the unexecuted stipulations of any treaties, or for the misappropriation of any of the funds of said Omaha tribe any money due; and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the Court of Claims to hear and determine all claims of said Omaha tribe against the United States and to enter judgment thereon, and to enter judgment in favor of the attorneys of said Indians for proper attorneys' fees, which said award shall be paid by a separate warrant. The Court of Claims shall advance said cause upon the docket. If any question is submitted to said court, it shall settle the rights, both legal and equitable, of both the Omaha tribe of Indians and the United States, notwithstanding lapse of time or statutes of limitations, and the final judgment and satisfaction thereof in said cause shall be deemed a final settlement of all claims of said Omaha Indians against the United States. Such action in the Court of Claims shall be presented by a single petition, subject, however, to amendment, to be filed within one year after the passage of said act, and such action shall make the Omaha tribe of Indians party plaintiff and the United States party defendant, and shall set forth all the facts on which the Omaha tribe of Indians bases its claim for recovery; and the said petition may be verified by the attorney employed by the said Omaha Indians, under the contract filed in the Indian Office on the 4th day of March, 1898, and reported upon to the Secretary of the Interior on the 1st day of May, 1901, upon information and belief as to the existence of such facts, and no other stateme

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That is another of those jurisdictional matters, which I ask may be passed over with the others.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President—
The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that I am making no point of order upon the amendment. I simply ask that it be passed over, as it falls within the class of amendments which have already been passed over.

Mr. BURKETT. I call the attention of the Senator from Wyoming to the fact that it is not exactly like the others.

This is simply for the adjustment of a treaty matter.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am not speaking of the subjectmatter, but it is one of the amendments conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims.

Mr. BURKETT. If the Senator from Wyoming wants it to go over, I have no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I think this case is very merito-

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be passed

Mr. CLAPP. On page 83, between lines 9 and 10, I desire to offer an amendment, which I ask to have read, printed, and lie on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The Secretary. On page 83, after line 9, it is proposed to insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Albert H. Raynolds, or his legal representatives, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,290.49, for and on account of two United States Indian vouchers in the amount of $1,382.51 and $907.98, issued on the 26th day of March, 1877, to Dwight J. McCann, an Indian freight contractor, and cashed by the said Albert H. Raynolds, and allowed for payment by the United States Government on the 2d day of May, 1877, and afterwards refused

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, under the subhead "Winnebagoes (treaty)," on page 85, after line 3, to strike out:

Withlebagoes (treaty), on page 35, after line 3, to strike out:

For interest on $804.909.17, at 5 per cent per annum, per fourth article of treaty of Novémber 1, 1837, $40,245.45; and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to expend said interest for the support, education, and civilization of said Indians, to be expended in such manner and to whatever extent that he may judge to be necessary and expedient for their welfare and best interest;

For interest on $78,340.41, at 5 per cent per annum, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior for the erection of houses, improvement of their allotments of land, purchase of stock, agricultural implements, seeds, and other beneficial objects, $3,917.02; In all, $44,162.47.

And insert:

And insert:

And insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to place upon the books of the Treasury to the credit of the Winnebago tribe of Indians the sum of $883,249.58, being the balances of the unappropriated amounts due said tribe under the fourth article of the treaty of November 1, 1837, to wit, $804,999.17 (7 Stat. L., p. 544), and the act of July 15, 1870, $78,340.41 (16 Stat. L., p. 355), and said sum shall draw interest at 5 per cent per annum; and the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to pay per capita to the members of the tribe the said sum under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, in the same manner as provided by the act of April 21, 1904 (33 Stat. L., p. 201).

In all, $883,249.58.

Mr. HALE: This amendment relates to the Winnebago In-

Mr. HALE. This amendment relates to the Winnebago Indians. The sum involved is much larger than was covered by the other provisions for other tribes, the policy being that submitted by the committee of paying the principal and distributing it rather than paying the interest. Is the Senator from Minnesota satisfied that the conditions of the tribe, the number and everything relating to them, are such that they should come within the rule adopted by the committee, and that the whole amount should be paid now rather than the interest?

Mr. CLAPP. With the change that we made, that seemed to be the sense of the Commissioner, and I myself saw no reason why it should not be done.

Mr. HALE. It is about $800,000. Does the Senator know how large this tribe is?

Mr. CLAPP. No, I do not. As a rule I think they are pretty well advanced. However, if the Senator from Maine feels, in view of what we are doing in that respect at this session, that perhaps it would be well not to go too fast, I have no objection at all to striking out this provision.

Mr. HALE. I am entirely willing to leave it to the discretion of the Senator. He knows more about it than I do.

Mr. CURTIS. There are about 2,000 members of this tribethe Winnebagoes.

Mr. HALE. Are they in a fairly civilized condition? Mr. CURTIS. Some of them are, but I think there are quite a number of them who are not qualified to manage their own

Mr. HALE. What does the Senator-it is in his neighborhood-himself think about the advisability of now distributing all this large sum?

Mr. CURTIS. I think it would be a mistake to pay the money out, but if it could be placed in the Treasury to the credit of the tribe, and then be paid out at the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, I do not think any mistake would be made. I think these Indians are about in the same condition as the Indians in Kansas—the Pottawatomies—all of whom are not qualified to properly handle money paid to them, but many of whom are men who could manage their own affairs.

Mr. HALE. The Senator believes that if it is left, according to the provisions of the amendment, discretionary with the Secretary, it will be entirely safe?

Mr. CURTIS. I should think so. Mr. BURKETT. I want to say to the Senator-

Mr. CLAPP. I desire to call attention to one thing that I overlooked. I failed to move to strike out the words "and directed" from this particular amendment. I move to strike out those words in line 24 on page 85.

Mr. CURTIS. I understood they had been stricken out.
Mr. CLAPP. I supposed they had been.
The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota proposes an amendment to the amendment, which will be stated.

The Secretary. On page 85, line 24, it is proposed to strike out the words "and directed."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to inquire of the Senator in charge of the bill whether he is willing to have it laid aside for the remainder of the day, so that we may have a brief executive session?

Mr. CLAPP. That course will be agreeable to me.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Saturday, February 2, 1907.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, as follows: Infinite and eternal spirit, God, our heavenly Father, in whom we live and move and have our being. We thank Thee for every aspiration, for every earnest and noble endeavor which leads on to larger life and civilization, and for that profound appreciation which enables us to recognize the nobility of soul and real worth in our fellow-men. We thank Thee for the special order which sets apart this day as a memorial service to one who became conspicuous as a statesman, who by earnest and faithful endeavor rose from the humble position of a page on the floor of the United States Senate to a member of that august body, and who by common consent became the leader of his party, than which no greater encomium could be pronounced, no grander monument reared to his memory. Grant that his character may ever be an inspiration to noble and pure living to those who survive him and to those who shall come after us, and thine be the glory forever. And now, Almighty Father, we are again moved by the news of the death of one of our Congressional family. Comfort, we beseech Thee, those who are bereft of a dear one, and help us all to live so that when our time shall come we shall pass on and hear the word, Well done, good and faithful servant, enter into the joys of thy Lord.

Through Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 24991—the river and harbor appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the river and harbor appropriation bill, with Mr. CURRIER in the chair.

Mr. ACHESON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to submit for the consideration of the committee certain facts relative to the improvement of Cold Spring Inlet, Cape May, N. J.

The subcommittee of the House Committee on Rivers and Harbors, to whom this project was referred, consisted of Messrs. McLachlan of California, Jones of Washington, Ransdell of Louisiana, Humphreys of Mississippi, and myself. After ex-amining the favorable reports of the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors carefully, the subcommittee went before that Board for additional information. Several of the interested parties were also invited to be present at this hearing. After the subcommittee had thoroughly discussed all the features of After the project, it unanimously decided that if those interested would contribute the sum of $100,000 it would recommend that the Government expend enough to make the channel. One fact which influenced the subcommittee was that a large amount of moneyover $5,000,000—had been expended in connection with the project. Another fact was that the State of New Jersey, fronting 123 miles on the Atlantic ocean, had never received a cent in appropriations along the entire coast line, notwithstanding that millions of dollars worth of property and a large number of lives have been lost in the vicinity of this proposed improvement. In addition to this, the subcommittee believes there is no question about the future commercial possibilities of this enterprise. Seafaring people along the entire Atlantic coast appeared before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and the board of engineers in support of this project. It is warmly indorsed by the maritime exchanges of New York and Philadelphia, by the governor and legislature of the State of New Jersey, by Senators and Representatives, by the Vessel Owners' Association of Philadelphia, by the Delaware River and Bay Pilots' Associa-tion, by many steamship companies, and by hundreds of indi-viduals interested in commerce and navigation. No other project has ever received such an enthusiastic indorsement by maritime people.

The committee believes the project to improve Cold Spring Inlet and create a great landlocked harbor at Cape May is a thoroughly meritorious proposition. Its consummation will afford relief for annoying freight congestion at large seaboard The importance of improving natural channels to the sea and of opening new harbors where they can be readily reached by great railroad systems can not be overestimated. In a letter on "The transportation problem of the United States," addressed by James J. Hill on January 14 to Governor

Johnson, of Minnesota, Mr. Hill says:

Johnson, of Minnesota, Mr. Hill says:

The business of the United States is to-day so congested that from every portion of the country arises clamor for relief. The railroads everywhere are taxed beyond their power. The people of the United States, therefore, are face to face with the greatest business problem that has ever threatened the nation. During recent years the volume of business has increased and is increasing with extraordinary rapidity, while the necessary additional trackage and terminals have not been equal to the demands upon them. The resulting situation is a freight blockade of enormous proportions, especially at all terminal points. How to remedy this is a problem—financial, mechanical, and physical. No time should be lost in applying such measures of remedy as may be possible, and the first step toward this is to reach a proper understanding of actually existing conditions. * * * And it is in the great centers that the inadequacy of terminal facilities makes the pressure most severe and prevents the free flow of traffic. * * * The prohibitory expense now attached to enlargement of terminals at many points and the absolute lack of available space at any price may be met by a decentralization of traffic. There must be more points for expers, more interior markets. A 15-foot canal or channel from St. Louis to New Orleans would go further to relieve the entire Middle West and Southwest than any other work that could be undertaken.

With such a depth of water, a single powerful towboat would carry from thirty to forty train loads. Terminal troubles admit of a more general diffusion of business, permitting transfers to take place and forwarding to be done where land can be secured in adequate quantities and at more reasonable prices. To this the traffic system of the country must be adjusted. The heavy transfers must be made away from the larger cities.

Mr. Hill describes the transportation situation precisely, and what he says fits the Cape May project exactly. Here will be found another point for export. Enlargement of terminals at the great cities, New York and Philadelphia, can only be made at prohibitory expense. Land for terminals at Cape May can be secured in adequate quantities at reasonable prices

At the present time projects for the improvement of rivers and harbors, approved by the Engineers, which are on the books, would cost for completion probably $500,000,000. The average appropriations for rivers and harbors for the past twenty-five years have been less than $20,000,000 annually. At the present rate of progress it will take twenty-five years to carry out the old projects on hand without counting the new ones which are constantly coming in. We must either adopt a new policy and have annual river and harbor bills of generous proportions or encourage local participation in such work. The Government is now cooperating with various States in making a complete geological survey of the United States, the States bearing one-half of the expense. Why should not States and cities be encouraged to participate in the expense of making river and harbor improvements, where the localities wish to go ahead more rapidly than the Government can?

The Cape May proposition is an excellent example of participation on the part of those most interested in an improve-Until this project came before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors Pennsylvania and Philadelphia had the best record for participating in such improvements. The State of Pennsylvania, the city of Philadelphia, and private interests have contributed over $5,000,000 to supplement the work done by the Government on the Delaware River. The Stephen Girard estate, held in trust, has been a large contributor, because much of the property left by the old mariner, merchant, and philan-thropist was benefited. Now, we have at Cape May an instance of one small city and private interests expending a greater sum at one time in creating a magnificent harbor than one of our largest States and cities have expended in a century. terprise should be encouraged. The pressure for dockage room about New York is tremendous. It is so at Philadelphia. This pressure must increase with the wonderful growth of our commerce. The time is rapidly approaching when every available point of export on the Atlantic seaboard will be needed to accommodate the vast business seeking an outlet. The New Jersey coast will afford other opportunities for the creation of splendid harbors which the expansion of our commerce will de-It is to be hoped that other enterprising communities will follow the example of Cape May.

The Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors indorses the project in this language:

Based on its examination of the locality, the large amount of data presented for its consideration, and the apparent advantages and value of a deep and land-locked harbor, with good railroad connections, the Board has arrived at the conclusion that the prospective commerce of this locality is sufficient to justify the United States in providing a suitable connection between the harbor and deep water outside. The improvement of a harbor by the United States solely on a basis of prospective commerce is, the Board believes, without precedent, and in making a favorable recommendation the Board has given considerable weight to the fact that large expenditures have been made here by prominent commercial interests, and it is but reasonable to suppose that from business motives strong efforts will be made to carry the enterprise to complete and successful termination.

Here, then, is a safe landlocked harbor for commerce and of refuge with an area of over 500 acres, or almost 1 square mile, with depth of from 30 to 40 feet. Over $5,000,000 have been or will be expended in connection with this project. ernment is asked to expend $1,211,000 in providing a 25-foot channel, less than a half mile in length, to connect it with the sea. Is not this a good business proposition for the Government? The development of a great commerce is an absolute certainty. The Cape May Harbor will afford relief for the pressure for terminal facilities and dockage room at the large seaboard cities of the Atlantic coast. The Government engineers speak of it as making a precedent and being therefore a question for Congress in its wisdom to decide. Congress can make no mistake by voting to encourage local communities to assist in the expensive work of providing outlets for the rapidly expanding commerce of the country.

When the Cape May Harbor is completed coal from Pennsylvania and the products of farm and factory in that State and of those farther west can be shipped to Cape May quicker than they can reach Philadelphia, because they will be run around that city and avoid the terminal delays. It will be so with goods imported at Cape May bound for points west of Philadelphia. The railroad freight rate to and from Cape May will be no greater than to and from Philadelphia.

While the plan to make such a harbor is a novel experiment, it is one of great value to the country. On the Pacific coast good harbors are few and far between. The completion of the deep-water harbor at Cape May will demonstrate the fact that such harbors can be built at many points not now considered available. The Cape May Harbor will be of national importance and should not be opposed by the representatives of any section of the country.

The whole New Jersey coast is destined to become a mere suburb of the great cities of New York and Philadelphia, with other fine artificial harbors. It matters not whose money constructs these harbors the people will get the benefit.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, in the course of my remarks I shall discuss a project known as the "Norfolk-Beaufort Inlet Waterway," extending from Norfolk, Va., southwardly through the inland sounds of North Carolina, with an outlet to the ocean at Beaufort Inlet. Before doing so, however, I wish to submit some observations upon the general subject of the improvement of our waterways and of appropriations therefor. There recently appeared in the press a letter written by Mr. James J. Hill, the president of the Great Northern Railroad, to the governor of Minnesota. Mr. Hill is one of the great masters of transportation, and his statements and conclusions are worthy of serious consideration. He described in graphic terms the congested condition of traffic on the railroads of the country, and his description is illustrated in every commercial center and in every considerable railroad terminal, and the resultant delays in traffic are felt by every industrial enterprise, every merchant, and every shipper throughout the country. He showed that the business of the country had outgrown the capacity of the railroads. It is estimated that for the decade from 1895 to 1905 the traffic offered to the railroads for movement increased more than 115 per cent. By way of contrast it is further estimated that the increase in mileage during the same time was only 21 per cent, the increase in locomotives 35 per cent, and the increase in the number of freight cars was only 45 per cent. These fig-ures tell the story and explain the complaints of shippers against the railroads. It is impossible for the railroads of the country to meet the demands for the movement of traffic.

This prosperity which the country has been enjoying for some years could not have existed without the facilities of transportation. Transportation is the very life-blood of commerce, and unless a remedy shall be found for the delays and losses incident to present railroad traffic the growth of our internal commerce will be checked and ultimately paralyzed. What, then, is the remedy? It has been suggested that the railroads provide additional mileage and equipment. Mr. Hill discusses that proposition and submits that an approximate remedy would be afforded if we could build annually for the next five years 11,000 miles of additional track, with one-third more added thereto for sidings and terminal tracks, most of which additional mileage should be in constructing double tracks. This increase, he estimates, would involve the expenditure of more than $1,000,000,000 per annum. The diversion of so large a proportion of capital, to say nothing of the scarcity of labor and the difficulty in obtaining the necessary material for construction, would prevent the construction of this additional mileage and necessary equipment. The remedy then must be sought elsewhere. We must again adopt the policy inaugurated by the fathers of the country before we began that marvelous era of railroad construction about 1835. We must improve and deepen our navigable waterways, extending them far into the interior. We must canalize our interior rivers wherever practicable, and construct canals where the physical and commercial conditions justify. They must be kept absolutely free, to the end that individuals and corporations with capital may utilize them for the movement of barges and cheap freight steamers.

There are many reasons which might be urged in favor of opening up our waterways. I will take the time to mention only two.

First. Movement by water is the cheapest of all methods. According to a table prepared by the editor of Poor's Railroad Manual, it appears that for the year 1904 the cost of movement per ton per mile upon the railroads of the country was 8 mills. Contrast this rate with that of the Sault Ste. Marie Canal. According to a report issued by the Bureau of Statistics it appears that the cost of movement on this canal for the same period was eight-tenths of a mill per ton per mile—the cost by rail being more than ten times as great as by water. But it may be said that this is not a fair illustration, owing to the bulky and weighty nature of the traffic which passes through this waterway, such as iron ore, coal, and other like products. This is largely true. Nevertheless, it may be stated without exaggeration that the average cost of movement by rail is more than five times as great as the average cost of movement by water.

Second. Another advantage may be stated. Waterways are free to all who may wish to navigate them. Railroads are necessarily monopolies, and no one may utilize their tracks except the companies which construct and own them. Railroads are very expensive, requiring immense sums to construct and operate, which condition has been emphasized since so many of the smaller roads have been consolidated into trunk lines and On the other hand, one or more individuals could construct barges and freight steamers, thus enabling communities to protect themselves against high rates and inferior service by the railroads. This proposition has been illustrated with much clearness and force by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG] and by his colleague from the same State [Mr. The improvement of these interior waterways will RAINEY 1. accomplish more effectively the regulation of traffic rates and the restoration of equality of service upon the railroads than can possibly be accomplished through the intervention of the Interstate Commerce Commission or the railroad commissions of the several States.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if my premises are correct, there is one inevitable conclusion, to the effect that it is the paramount duty of the Congress, in the improvement of waterways, to improve and open up those extending into the interior and thereby help to relieve this congestion of commerce and maintain our large domestic trade. This bill provides an aggregate of more than $83,000,000, and yet a very large proportion of this sum, if not more than one-half, is for the deepening and enlargement of the great harbors on our coast or for streams which do not afford competition with the railroads. The continued improvement of our harbors simply meets the greater demand for increased depth in order to accommodate the greater draft of vessels engaged in our foreign trade, 90 per cent of which are sailing under foreign registers and foreign flags.

In view of this congested condition of traffic, which threatens the integrity of our internal commerce and certainly tends to arrest its growth, this river and harbor bill, which is intended primarily to promote our commerce, should have been framed for the purpose of meeting that exigency.

In this connection, Mr. Chairman, it may be interesting to contrast our domestic trade with our foreign trade. For the year just past it is estimated that the internal commerce of this country, based on single transactions, amounted in round numbers to $25,000,000,000; for the same year our foreign trade for the first time in our history slightly exceeded $3,000,000,000, showing that our foreign trade is less than one-eighth of our domestic trade. It will be interesting also to contrast our production with our exports. The Bureau of Statistics estimates that for the past year we produced in manufactured goods $12,000,-000,000; in farm products, $6,000,000,000, and in mineral products $2,000,000,000. Out of this aggregate production of $20,-000,000,000 we exported the small proportion of $1,000,800,000, or less than one-tenth of our production. Not only does this contrast between our domestic and our foreign trade and between our production and our exports carry with it a fruitful object lesson, but there is the additional proposition which can not be controverted, that if we wish to maintain our prosperity and to continue the industrial growth with which we have been blessed in recent years, we must preserve and en-courage every factor which shall tend to conserve this great internal commerce in its full integrity and volume. This in my judgment, was not constructed along proper lines. This bill. items of appropriation should have recognized a larger number of interior projects and should have contained more generous

The House has been entertained for more than two days with interesting, instructive, and forceful addresses upon the great project which has been termed the "14-foot waterway from Chicago to the Gulf." I do not know whether the River and Harbor Committee have sufficient information upon which to reach an intelligent conclusion as to the value or the engineering feasibility or the commercial necessity of the project, but whenever these questions shall have been answered in the affirmative it ought to be constructed if it can be done within reasonable cost. Personally I have no doubt that whatever the great States of the Mississippi Valley desire—I use this designation to include not only the States lying alongside that great river, but also the interior States drained by its tributarles—they will in good time secure. The Republican party is dominated by the States of the Middle West; the Speaker resides in one of those great States, and the committee assignments are held by Representatives from these States. The Committee on Rivers and Harbors is made up as to both parties largely from the Mississippi Valley and the Gulf, which result was scarcely an accident of politics. Not only the center of population has moved constantly westward, but the scepter of political power has likewise departed from the East. Excepting a few great harbors, the Atlantic seaboard has suffered discrimination in the appropriations contained in the bill. It is not the Mississippi Valley or the Middle West which has cause to complain now or in the future, but the eastern seaboard States.

Mr. Chairman, referring to interior waterways, there are other lesser projects in the Mississippi Valley and other sections of the country to which I shall not have the time to advert; but I wish to direct attention briefly to some of the meritorious projects along the Atlantic seaboard. For more than one hundred years the people of New England have contemplated the construction of a canal across Cape Cod, connecting Barnstable Bay and Buzzards Bay. Impatient at the delay of Congress, a strong organization with ample capital, as stated in the press, has recently been organized for the purpose of constructing this long-discussed canal. I hope they will succeed in their purpose; but it should be accomplished not by private enterprise, but by the Government of the United States and dedicated freely to commerce. This canal in connection with Long Island Sound would furnish a safe inside route from Boston to New York.

Coming farther south there is a canal connecting the Raritan River with the Delaware River, which has been controlled for many years by the Pennsylvania Railroad. There is a safe route from New York Harbor to Raritan Bay and River, and this canal would give connection with the Delaware River and the large commerce tributary thereto. It is plainly the duty of Congress to meet the demands of the metropolis of New York, of Philadelphia, and the cities of New Jersey, and to enlarge and construct this waterway of sufficient depth and width to accommodate the commerce which would seek this passage.

There has also been in existence for many years a small canal connecting Delaware River with Chesapeake Bay. At the last session of Congress a resolution was passed authorizing the President to appoint a Commission to settle upon a route and estimate the cost of a waterway connecting the Delaware with the Chesapeake. That Commission has performed its work and made its report to Congress recommending the route of the present Delaware and Chesapeake Canal, and that it be enlarged and deepened to 35 feet, and estimating the cost of same at $20,000,000. This project, having been determined to be feasible, ought to be owned and enlarged by the United States and dedicated to commerce.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. SMALL. Certainly.
Mr. GOULDEN. Can he give the committee information as to the cost of the Raritan Canal, connecting the two rivers he has spoken of in New Jersey? He omitted that.

Mr. SMALL. In answer to the gentleman I will say that, so far as I am aware, the commercial value of that canal to the United States, if it desired to purchase the same, has not been estimated. I have seen no estimate of it.
Mr. GOULDEN. No estimate of cost?

Mr. SMALL. No estimate of cost, or rather no estimate of what its proper value would be to the United States Govern-

Now, Mr. Chairman, we have reached Chesapeake Bay by a protected route, from which are reached the cities of Baltimore and Norfolk and many other thrifty cities and towns. It may be pertinent here to make an explanatory statement. the Government has not yet purchased and enlarged either the Delaware and Raritan Canal or the Delaware and Chesapeake Canal, still there is a large coastwise trade between Norfolk on the south and New York on the north. While the protection afforded by the two last-named waterways is essential, still coastwise navigation is not so hazardous as absolutely to prevent small steamers and barges from engaging in the coastwise trade between these points. There is a large volume of coastwise traffic between New York and Norfolk and intermediate points, much of which is carried by barges.

From Norfolk south we meet an entirely different condition. There is scarcely any coastwise trade between Norfolk and points north and the southern ports. It is true there are a few lines of coastwise steamships trading between some of the southern ports and the cities north of Hatteras, as well as a few large sailing vessels. The tonnage of traffic which they carry, compared with that which would naturally seek movement by water between the northern and southern ports, is comparatively insignificant. This is true on account of the hazards of navigation around Cape Hatteras and the Diamond Shoals. I have upon other occasions in this Chamber dwelt upon the dangers and hazards of this "graveyard of the Atlantic;" I have submitted data from the Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service, detailing from year to year the appalling loss of life and shipping upon these treacherous sands which project for miles out into the Atlantic; I have heretofore attempted to give some description of the stress of storm and sea in this locality, and I shall not at this time dwell upon a condition which is so well recognized by intelligent people everywhere. The dangers of the North Carolina coast will always stand as a menace and obstacle to the development of coastwise trade between the North and the South, and any suggestion which shall eliminate its dangers and provide a safe interior passage is worthy of thoughtful consideration and the support of the Congress

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to direct attention to a project which is intended to accomplish the purpose indicated. [At this point Mr. SMALL asked that a large map illustrating this waterway be brought into the Chamber for the inspection of Members.] The project to which I refer connects the Chesapeake Bay on the north with Beaufort Inlet on the south. It is known as the "Norfolk-Beaufort Inlet Waterway." I ask gentlemen to follow me on the map. This waterway extends from Norfolk, Va., up the southern branch of the Elizabeth River; thence by the existing Albemarle and Chesapeake Canal through what is known as the "Virginia Cut" and the North Carolina Cut; thence by North River, Albemarle Sound, Croatan Sound, Pamlico Sound, and Neuse River; thence by Adams Creek to the head thereof; thence a cut of 4 miles to the head of Core Creek, and thence by Core Creek and Newport River to Beaufort Inlet. The entire route follows existing waterways and involves only solid excavation of 4 miles between the head of Adams Creek and the Head of Core Creek.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SMALL. Certainly. Mr. GOULDEN. What is the distance between Norfolk and Beaufort by the proposed route?

Mr. SMALL. Answering the gentleman, I would say that the total distance from Norfolk to Beaufort Inlet by the proposed route is 204 miles. I would state further that the project is for a depth of 12 feet, and that the cost thereof, as estimated by the engineers in their last report, is a little less than three and one-half million dollars.

LOCAL BENEFITS.

Having outlined this project, I will ask the attention of the House, briefly, to a consideration of the benefits which will ensue from its construction. These benefits may be divided into "local," such as are local to tide-water North Carolina and Virginia, and "general," such as will promote the entire coastwise trade. First, as to the local benefits: It appears in the report of the Board of Engineers, from data furnished by the various towns and sections in eastern North Carolina, that the commerce to be annually affected by this waterway amounted to $1,500,000, and that the annual saving to commerce would be $750,000.

The Board of Engineers suggested that these figures were an exaggeration; but they admitted that the annual saving to North Carolina alone would amount to at least $200,000. Mind you, this last was the estimate of the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, which sits in Washington and has the power to supervise the reports of district engineers and special boards of engineers, and which has never been particularly friendly to this project. The annual saving of $200,000 would amount to 51 per cent upon the cost of construction, estimated at $3,500,000.

Mr. GARRETT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SMALL. Certainly.
Mr. GARRETT. The dotted line on the map—is that the route recommended by the engineers?
Mr. SMALL. The route recommended by the engineers is indicated by the prominent red line. The other lines are the alternate routes.

Mr. GOULDEN. And almost all of the route recommended is a natural waterway requiring but little attention or improvement, as I understand it?

Mr. SMALL. I thank the gentleman for that inquiry. most of it is a natural waterway, excepting the short distance included in the Albemarle and Chesapeake Canal, which it is proposed to purchase, and in addition there will be only 4 miles of solid excavation. The remainder of the route will be a natural waterway, only a part of which will require any improve-

I wish to call the attention of the House to the anomalous condition that exists in eastern North Carolina. Beginning with the Neuse River on the south, upon which the city of Newbern is located—and in which my colleague Mr. Thomas resides—and going northwardly, you will note the Pamlico River, the Roanoke River, the Chowan River, and the Perquimans and Pasquotank rivers, all of which are bold, navigable streams. call attention to the large body of water known as Pamlico Sound. I also direct attention to the Albemarle Sound, which, by the way, is a body of fresh water, owing to the large volume of fresh water flowing down the Roanoke and Chowan rivers, and being the largest body of fresh water within the limits of the United States except the Great Lakes. It may be said in passing that this is a great fishing section, more shad being caught in this sound and its tributaries than elsewhere in the country.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman allow another question?

Mr. SMALL. Certainly.

Mr. GOULDEN. What is the difference in the distance between the ocean route from Norfolk to Beaufort Inlet via Cape Henry and Cape Hatteras and the inside route which you are discussing?

Mr. SMALL. I am glad the gentleman asked that question. The difference in distance is more than 100 miles. However, while the difference in distance is a consideration, the greatest advantage lies in the fact that the inside route is safe and will admit of movement by barges and cheap freight steamers.

Adverting again to the local conditions, I will say there are at least eighteen counties in eastern North Carolina tributo these rivers and sounds, and according to the census of 1900 these counties produced in farm products more than $14,-000,000 in value, and in manufacturing products more than $10,000,000 in value; besides, there is a population of more than 400,000 people living in the section immediately tributary to these inland waters. The map shows that the ocean lies east of this section of North Carolina; and yet I call your attention to the pertinent fact that all these sounds and navigable rivers and this large area are all landlocked and have no navigable outlet It is true there are several small inlets through which the tide ebbs and flows, but either on the bar or on the inside there are obstacles which limit navigation to a few feet in depth. I venture the assertion that there is not within the entire country a similar area possessing such fertile lands and other natural resources which is so landlocked and deprived of extending its water-borne trade to other cities. Beaufort Inlet can not be reached from Pamlico Sound because of the limited depth of Core Sound, the average depth therein being only about The only navigable outlet for all this section is toward the north through a private canal affording an entrance into Elizabeth River and thence into Chesapeake Bay. I ask, gentlemen, if the situation which I have described does not appeal strongly for relief to the country and to Congress?

GENERAL BENEFITS OF COASTWISE TRADE.

I wish now to present the general benefits to our entire coastwise trade to accrue from the construction of this waterway. I said a momont ago that the volume of coastwise traffic between the ports north of Cape Hatteras and south of Cape Hatteras was insignificant compared with the total of the bulky products exchanged between the North and the South and which would naturally seek water transportation. I stated that this was true because of the dangers of Cape Hatteras and the Diamond Shoals on the North Carolina coast. I also asserted that the only coastwise navigation between the North and the South was by a few lines of steamships operating from New York, Baltimore, and Philadelphia with a few of the southern ports and the occasional large sailing vessels, all of which give Hatteras a wide berth. It is also a significant fact, as I am informed. that each one of the steamship lines now engaged in this trade is owned or controlled either by the trunk lines of railroads operating between the North and the South or have been acquired by the new transportation magnate, Mr. Morse, who has purchased the remainder. Certainly this condition does not appear inviting for competitive traffic or for the healthy growth of the coastwise trade.

It is further to be noted that coastwise navigation south of Beaufort Inlet is comparatively safe. Ordinarily any vessel which can navigate Chesapeake Bay with safety can engage in coastwise trade south of Cape Lookout, and this is a fact generally conceded by navigators. When this waterway shall be open to navigation it will be entirely feasible for the cities of New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Norfolk, and the intermediate ports to engage in trade by barges with Wilmington, N. C., Charleston, Georgetown, Brunswick, Savannah, Fernandina, and Jacksonville. Only small capital would be necessary, and we could then have a really competitive method of transportation, affording the best service and the cheapest rates. This waterway would accommodate steamers and barges having a draft of 10 feet, and it has been demonstrated that a barge having a draft of 10 feet can be so constructed as to have a capacity of 1,000 tons, and that such a barge would afford the minimum of cost in transportation.

Now, as to the general commercial benefits. In the former report of the Board of Engineers upon this project for a 16foot depth, made in 1903, there appeared a large volume of commercial data submitted by the commercial organizations between Baltimore and Jacksonville, inclusive. There were reports from the commercial organizations in Baltimore, Norfolk, Wilmington, Georgetown, Charleston, Brunswick, Savannah, Fernandina, and Jacksonville. A summary of these reports shows an estimated annual saving in our coastwise trade of the several ports between Baltimore and Jacksonville of five and one-half million dollars.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed fifteen minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that in allowing time between now and 2 o'clock the allotment is such that it would break up the arrangement if the gentleman had fifteen minutes more.

Mr. SMALL. I regret, Mr. Chairman, that I was not advised of that condition earlier.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will be recognized for ten minutes more.

Mr. SMALL. Continuing along the same line, I will say that the data collated by the commercial organizations was laid before the special board of engineers. They did not agree with the foregoing estimate, but the board on their part estimated that the traffic in the coastwise trade to be affected annually would amount to 1,100,000 tons and that an annual saving would be effected amounting to $600,000. This saving would amount to more than 17 per cent of the cost thereof. If there was a private enterprise upon which a saving of 17 per cent in any business could be effected, there would be no difficulty in enlisting capital to the amount of $3,500,000 or more for such a profitable investment. The commercial organizations in the cities referred to represent the intelligence and enterprise of their respective communities. If they made any error, it was due to their zeal for the project. The bare facts connected with this waterway have never been presented to any intelligent person with the slightest comprehension of the needs of our coastwise trade without enlisting immediate support and approval. Certainly the special board of engineers, who in 1903 and 1906 made careful examination of the subject, were not controlled by sentimental considerations. Truly this is also a national project and will affect the entire coastwise trade from New York to Jacksonville.

This project has another conspicuous merit, upon which it is not necessary to dwell. Each report of the Board of Engineers has emphasized the strategic advantage of this waterway as an additional arm of defense in time of war. It would not accommodate our great battle ships, neither would any other waterway now projected have sufficient depth, but it would accommodate our torpedo boats and torpedo-boat destroyers, our submarines and small gunboats and transports. Additional stress has recently been laid upon the value of sub-marines, and it now seems probable that these sleuths of the sea will form a prominent part of our naval establishment. is useless to dwell upon an advantage so universally conceded.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it may be asked, if this waterway is of such transcendent necessity as a local project, if it will result so largely in the promotion of our coastwise trade, and if it is such an advantage and saving to commerce, why has it not been recognized by the River and Harbor Committee of this House, which initiates legislation and recommends appropria-tion for such purposes? This is one of the mysteries which I am unable to explain and which dwells in the minds of the dis-tinguished chairman and the members thereof, assuming that the latter have taken the trouble to study the subject. I speak from a sense of duty when I say that this project has not been treated fairly by the committee nor by its chairman. pending bill was being framed it was only considered at all by a subcommittee, of which the chairman of the full committee was also chairman. The chairman of the subcommittee declined to give the project his approval, and this deliverance was taken as binding upon the subcommittee. It has not been considered at all by the full committee, because the chairman declined to grant that privilege. So far as this particular measure is concerned, it has been excluded from this bill because the chairman so decreed. This is not deliberative legislation; but it is a form of legislative tyranny, and ought not to be toler-Neither the chairman of the committee nor any member of the committee will debate this project upon its merits. challenge a discussion here or elsewhere. The people of North Carolina whom I have the honor in part to represent, my colleagues from that State, the Representatives from the other seaboard States directly interested in this waterway have a right to demand its recognition and construction.

[Applause.]

This much I may say in all modesty, that so long as I occupy an humble place in this House, so long as my colleagues are here to speak for the right, so long as these other Representatives from the States to be directly affected are in Congress advocating its merits, so long will it remain a live issue, until it shall ultimately receive the recognition of the committee and be

I desire, Mr. Chairman, an opportunity to say this much upon this subject. I have spoken seriously. I feel that the measure has not been treated fairly and that there is warrant for the protest I have made. Equal justice will yet prevail, and before many years shall have passed the demand of tide-water Virginia and North Carolina and the demands of those who represent our coastwise trade will be fully recognized by the committee and by the Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I want to indulge in some observations upon the river and harbor bill, and I want to say at the outset that while I have with great uniformity until recent years opposed the river and harbor bill, I have never been opposed to legitimate improvement of rivers and harbors. ever objection I have had to river and harbor bills in the past has been with regard to the selection of the place of improvement or to the manner in which it was proposed to prosecute those improvements. Those great works in which all the country is interested, that do in fact contribute to and furnish facility for our interstate commerce, I do not oppose. I have opposed measures that were of purely local interest, that in no way contributed, except in a local sense, to the general commerce of the Republic, I have opposed certain improvements because I believed them to be utterly impracticable; that the mode proposed would be a failure, and in one at least of the most notable instances, that scheme of twenty-five years ago, the improvement of the Mississippi River, the conditions of to-day show that I was not incorrect in the judgment that I formed. I know, Mr. Chairman, that a man risks something in uttering a word in opposi-tion to a river and harbor bill. There is a class of people in all parts of this country which may generically be termed re-formers. There are many classes of men who may be included within that classification; but generally it is that class of people I refer to who desire to make something for themselves by seizing upon some question or other which they think has peculiar popularity with the people, constituting themselves its particular champion and denouncing all who do not agree with their particular notions as enemies to the common welfare Usually the man who refuses to support the river and harbor bill is charged with being a servant of the railway corpora-The reason of his hostility is said to be an improper desire upon his part to promote the interests of a rival method of transportation. I run the risk now in what I am about to say of subjecting myself again to that charge, made twentyfive years ago and repeated by some miscreants at biennial periods ever since, and I suppose it still has a lodgment in their minds. Mr. Chairman, this scheme which was developed yesterday by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Clark], the improvement of the navigation of the Missouri River, and that of his colleague, Doctor Bartholdt, the making of a 14-foot channel in the Mississippi River from St. Louis to New Orleans, admonishes us that the improvements that they propose are of gigantic character, at least so far as expenditure is concerned. The gentleman representing a St. Louis district told us that this scheme of improving the Mississippi River demanded an expenditure far in excess of the revenues of the Treasury, I think about $250,000,000. He advised us in another part of his address that in order to accomplish his scheme a new bond issue would be necessary, and further along he fixed the figure of this bond issue at the colossal sum of $500,000,000. As a part of the same general scheme, the improvement of the Missouri River, the other gentleman from the State of Missouri told us in substance, as it appeared to his eye, would involve the building of two granite walls, to contain and restrain the torrents of the Missouri, extending from its mouth to Fort Benton, a distance of perhaps 2,000 miles. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Madden] has also his pet scheme of a 14-foot waterway from Chicago to St. Louis.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Clark] always has grand conceptions. A student of history, a classical scholar, he draws his illustrations from history and from the classics, and then to adapt them to our day accepts the multiplied expenditure. His comparison shows the wealth and importance of the commerce of to-day when contrasted with that of the Roman era or the earlier periods of the world's history. Think, Mr. Chairman, this gentleman, while a classical scholar, while possessing all the arts of the orator, a historian, to whom we all give grateful audience whenever he will speak upon such subjects, is beyond that a man of practical qualifications. He speaks from the standpoint of the real when he admonishes this House that in order to complete his cherished project of improving the navigation of the Missouri River that there may be two granite walls at uniform distance from each other and extending through a line of territory of possibly 2,000 miles.

Think for a moment of what that involves. The Missouri

River traverses through almost all of its length, at least in that stretch which he has mentioned, an alluvial region. a foundation for his colossal granite walls you would have to go down full 200 feet or more from the surface of the stream. What a project this is! Not one granite wall, but two granite walls, 200 feet high, 2,000 miles long. [Laughter.] Chairman, certain Chinese ages ago-so long ago that the time just when is lost in the mists of the ancient days-made themselves famous as constructors by building a wall that is only some 7 feet high and only about 450 miles long. That wall has lived in history for all these centuries. What is that in That wall comparison with the colossal performance of the project by my friend from Missouri? Ah, he spoke wisely when he sug-gested that immortal fame surrounded the names of those men who undertake gigantic enterprises in engineering and accomplish them. He who projected this Chinese wall may have been forgotten by most of us. Undoubtedly the gentleman, when he is called upon, can give his name, the date of his birth, the location he has made famous by that event; but if it did that for him with his puny 7-foot wall in height and 450 miles in length, what will be the immortality of my friend when he completes this gigantic structure of a wall which, if placed end to end, would be 4,000 miles in extent and two hundred and more feet in height? [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, the gentleman was more happy than even he assumed, because he has, in my humble judgment, told the country just what is necessary to accomplish this work of internal improvement of which he is the advocate. Think of the expenditure. Think of the importance of the undertaking, if it is within the limit of the desire of prudent, sensible men. Mr. Chairman, I have seen that splendid river, 5 miles in width, a raging torrent, a volume of water moving with extraordinary velocity that would defy the puny attempts of man to control or master. The idea, to my mind, is so preposterous that I scarcely can conceive it possible that the gentleman looks upon it as a thing to be seriously discussed. What would it be if he could accomplish his purpose?

The engineers who are wise in this business of expending the Government's money tell us that the theory of contraction be-Government's money ten us that the theory of the curtween rigid walls is that you increase the velocity of the curtween rigid walls is that you increase the velocity of the curtween courses out of the bottom of the stream. What would rent and scouring out of the bottom of the stream. be the result? My friend has his wall properly constructed. We will assume, for the purpose of the argument, that the stream is confined to the waterway prepared for it. It has the scouring properties which the engineers say. What then? It burrows itself down to the bed rock, and there you have a canyon 200 feet in depth through which this torrent passes. Of course the gentleman in the interest of economy would straighten the river, and in that way would save perhaps 50 per cent of his granite construction, but that river now has a slope of a little more than a foot to the mile. By shortening it, by cutting off the bends and the sinuosities, he would shorten the river 50 per cent and thereby double the slope, and in doubling the slope he would multiply the velocity. It has now a velocity of 4 or 5 miles an hour. When the waterway as projected is completed its velocity of current would be multiplied many times.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield?
Mr. HEPBURN. I do not desire to be interrupted at this When it is completed it would have a velocity of 25 miles an hour, admirable for downstream navigation possibly, but how would vessels get up? [Laughter.] They would have the same engineering problem that it is said Thomas Jefferson once had. He proposed the erection of a windmill on a promontory on his estate for the purpose of sawing lumber. It was a high hill, admirably adapted to catch every breeze, no matter from what direction it might come.

His engineer thought, upon viewing the ground and looking over his plans, that it was feasible; that they would have the motor and that it would saw the lumber; but he destroyed the efficiency of the project by suggesting: "Mr. President, how are you going to get your logs up to the mill?" And that would be the difficulty here. There is another project—that of improving the Mississippi River. The plans proposed by some of these gentlemen are a little unique. They propose a 14-foot depth of water from Chicago to St. Louis, and after they get this, on their downward trip to the Gulf, they are willing to content themselves with 8 feet of depth. That is the Chicago project. As the business accumulates, as the necessities increase, as the commerce expands in its volume, they propose after getting to the city of St. Louis to diminish their facilities in this wonderful proportion.

But, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Bar-THOLDT]—from the St. Louis district—told us that he wanted the system of revetment and the narrowing of the river by building a false bank in its bed wherever its width exceeded 4,000 feet. It is an old scheme. It is the old plan of the Mississippi River Commission now revived. Twenty-five years ago I attended one of these waterway conventions in the city of St. Then the engineers had but recently given voice to their projects of thus improving the river. They began it, they spent millions upon it—I think, Mr. Chairman, in excess of twenty-six millions—and then abandoned it, gave it up as impracticable, as every man familiar with that river knew it was, except the engineers. That scheme involved an expenditure of $38 a foot for the length of the river from St. Louis to New Orleans. Think They spent $26,000,000, and they found that the work of last year disappeared this year, and after trying to restore it a few times, even the engineers got wearied in their efforts, and the whole scheme was abandoned, and they went back to the old plan of removing the sand bar and the snag. The sand bar and the sinuosity of the river are nature's provision against the violence of the current. When you take out the sinuosity of the river and take out the sand bar and allow the water to flow as it will, upon even a slope of half a foot to the mile, you have a wonderful current, such a current as can not be navi-Some gentlemen are familiar with the regated upstream. ports of the Missouri River Commission. We had a body of that kind once. We have spent $10,000,000, mind you, already upon improving the navigation of the Missouri River. A part of my district abuts upon that river, and I assert that within the last fifteen years but one steamboat has gone up that stream engaged in commerce. In the old days when freights were high and railroads were not, the river boats could do business. But if the river was now navigable, boats could not compete with There could be, without doubt, proper appropriations made for the improvement or the maintenance of the banks of this river that would be of great benefit to the people living along it, but before I come to that I want to state that on the occasion that I have spoken of, in 1881, when I attended this convention, we were taken on a trip by the hospitable gentleman that entertained us.

They had at that time a project for carrying on the commerce of the Mississippi River by the use of powerful tow boats and tows of five barges, each to carry a thousand tons. The river at this time was at flood. We were told that there were twenty of these fleets. We were taken on a trip along the wharf of that city. We saw the greater number of the steamers, and I should say at least a hundred-seventy-five or a hundred-of the tow boats tied to the shore, not one of them in use. That morning I had read in the newspapers an order from the railway authorities, in instructing their agents to send no more grain to St. Louis, that all of the elevators then were filled, and that there were 2,000 unloaded cars then in Here was the river at flood. Here were the boats in abundance. Here was the freight, the owners of which were clamoring to have it moved. Not a pound of it going down the Mississippi River. I made inquiries as to why this was, and was told that wheat could not be carried in bulk from New Orleans to the markets, but that it had to be sacked in order to prevent sweat and deterioration. There were no ships at New Orleans to receive it, that the commerce of that city was sufficient only to furnish transportation for the cotton crop. No wheat, no corn, no grain of any kind was seeking a passage down the Mississippi River, and it never has, in large quantities, since the railway system began. Ah, gentlemen say that it is so much cheaper, and a gentleman from Ohio gave us an illustration the other day of what it is to ship by the river. He told us of one flotilla that carried 70,000 tons of coal for only a fraction of a mill a mile, and yet Mr. Chairman, that gentleman entirely omitted from the final cost of that transportation, of that illustration, one factor that must have cost at least -four or five times the amount of the freightagethat was the cost when moved in this way of carrying that coal from the flatboat-handling it by the shovel-carting it to the various places of distribution in the city.

In contrast it could be shown if transported by rail the coal would have been run on an elevated track and automatically unloaded, and thus saved cartage probably of 50 cents a ton, as I have been informed. That was not included in that statement of cheapness. No estimate was made of the losses from the boats that are not carried upstream again-a large percentage, as I am told. No thought was taken of this fact, that in that method of transportation the Government, the people, keep in repair the highway. We have spent upon the rivers of the United States $244,000,000 for improvements. We have spent upon the Mississippi River and its tributaries $125,000,000. We have spent in this matter of river and harbor improvements $523,000,000, all but sixteen and one-half millions of it since the Republican party came into power.

Gentlemen charge parsimony. Gentlemen charge neglect upon the part of the Federal Government. They never give you the They do not tell you of this colossal sum of more than half a billion dollars that have been expended of the people's money to improve this method of transportation. The city of Pittsburg furnishes an illustration of the comparative value where choice is given between the river and the rail. The city of Pittsburg creates more freightage than any other spot upon the globe. Last year it was 122,000,000 tons. One hundred and twenty-two millions! Think of that! Compare it with the weight of the cotton crop—about 6,000,000 tons. The whole cotton crop of the South not a fifteenth part of the freight created in this There they have the Ohio River, upon which we have expended many millions, and I think the gentleman representing Pittsburg has it in his mind to make a raid upon the Treasury for some three hundred millions, so the newspapers have stated it, but he modestly says only about $80,000,000, for the further improvement of the Ohio River.

Mr. DALZELL. I do not know what the gentleman refers to.
"The gentleman from Pittsburg" has made no such statement.

Mr. HEPBURN. Of what? Mr. DALZELL. That he wants either $300,000,000 or $80,-000,000, or any other amount.

Mr. HEPBURN. I will assume that he does not want it, but the other Pittsburg fellows want it. [Laughter.] Yet, Mr. Chairman, with the Ohio River at their very doors the creators of this vast tonnage have only shipped 11,000,000 tons down the Ohio River in a year, and that is confined almost exclusively. sively to coal.

Now, it is a most comfortable thing for our friends in New Orleans to have cheap coal and to boast about the cheapness of Ought not they to take into consideration the their river rate. largess of the Government that makes the way possible and which expends all these large sums on the rivers?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEPBURN. I yield to the gentleman. Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I understood the gentleman to say that these cheap rates he spoke of a moment ago were the effect of the people making the roadway down the river and keeping it up. Do they not keep up the roadway of the railroad by paying fixed charges and freight rates?

Mr. HEPBURN. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman knows that is scarcely a legitimate inquiry to make of me at this time.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I only wanted to see if there was anything in the statement he made that the people keep up

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes, sir; the people keep them up.
Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I also say that the people keep up the roadways on the railroads by paying the freight rates and charges to keep them up, and that the people pay for keeping them all up in either event.

Mr. HEPBURN. They pay for all. But when you talk about railroad freight, the fact is patent. In every report there are the items that go into what transportation costs, and the people. know it; and in the other, when they talk about the cheapness of the transportation, they do not take into account the large contributions that come from the people. It was that I was trying to get at, for we all know that in the long run the consumer of that which is consumed pays all the cost.

I see, Mr. Chairman, that my time is passing rapidly. I want to state the purpose that I have of later on offering an amendment to this bill. I call the attention of the chairman to the bill, on page 75, line 24, after the word "maintenance." I shall move at the proper time to insert the words "of channel and I shall move, on page 76, to strike out all of the proviso beginning with line 4, down to and including the word "and," in the ninth line, so that the appropriation can be used to maintain the permanency of the banks of the Missouri and prevent their caving in.

I want to say a word now in regard to that amendment. Missouri River from the city of Sioux City down to St. Joseph wanders through a broad bottom from 5 to 20 miles in breadth. It is an alluvium. There is a rich coat of soil 10 to 15 and 20 feet deep, underlain by a stratum of sand. When that river is at a certain stage and the surface is opposite this sand stratum it undermines the soil above it, and I have seen great stretches of that river, a quarter of a mile long, 2 and 3 rods in width, fall into the river, being thus undermined.

All of the vegetable matter, all of the lime, all of the clay, are taken in solution and carried down the river and, unless the current is in some way artificially retarded, deposited down in the Gulf, but the sand goes into the bottom of the river. The sand is never carried in solution. It is only moved by force along the bottom. Now, these rivers, the Mississippi and the Missouri, consist of a series of pools or lakes, with portages between. Much of the river is of sufficient depth for ordinary purposes of navigation, but the changing currents force the sand along until a sand bar is constructed, making a serious obstruc-I have conversed with many men upon this subject, and the only feasible way of improving that river for navigation purposes is to dredge out the sand bars. I know it is only temporary. It will form in some other place. The sand will be deposited in another sand bar, and that will have to be removed, but that is practicable; that can be done; and, as I understand it, that is the method that the Commission are now engaged upon. So far as I am informed, it is the only feasible way that, after many years of experience and observation, now suggests itself to their minds.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman permit? Mr. HEPBURN. Yes; a question.

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes; a question. Mr. GARRETT. The Mississippi River Commission began its work of keeping open the channel by the construction of Mr. HEPBURN. I yielded for a question. I do not want the interjection of a speech.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I have known of one stretch of the Missouri River which flows to-day 8 miles distant from where the current flowed in 1867. I have known of at least two flourishing towns upon the Iowa side of the river. river is now east of their sites and they have utterly disappeared. I have known of an instance where one railway company was compelled to move its depot building four times within one year. Now, these ravages upon this river can be prevented, and that cheaply, by building spur dams a few rods long at the beginning of a bend; dams made of mattresses weighted with stone and extending into the current and downward at an angle of about 30 degrees from the banks. forms a permeable dam, and the water creeping through the silt with which it is laden is deposited, because of the retardation of the current, and there is built up behind each of these dams a firm, substantial bank that diverts the current. Probably on the opposite side, at a distance of a few miles below, it would be necessary to build another one, and to let the river zigzag and have its sinuosity, but within the banks of the river—except a period of flood—instead of constantly encroaching upon and destroying the most valuable lands within the State of Iowa. These are valuable lands. They are under cultivation. There are some of them above overflow, and there are none of them that probably are overflowed more frequently than once in four or five years. The yield of corn upon them is so wonderful in the favorable seasons that men prefer them to the higher land, where crops can be raised each year without the fear of inundation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think that the amendment that I propose to offer is a practical one. I think it is very much better than the attempt to waste our money upon the improvement of the navigation of the river.

We have before us proof conclusive and satisfactory that the steamboat as a mode of transportation is not adapted to the wants of the people of to-day. Fifty years ago the waters of the Mississippi River were traversed by a wonderful fleet of splendid vessels. Magnificent palaces they were. I do not know how many, but I think I have seen as many as 100 at the wharf at St. Louis at the same time. They were ample for the traffic that came; but they have absolutely disappeared. Why? Because there is no demand for their use. I do not believe there is one of these large first-class vessels of which there used to be scores upon the river. There are a few lines of boats of the smaller variety that do a local business from one town to another, but I do not think there is a line of passenger boats now plying between St. Louis and New Orleans. I may be wrong about this, but if I am some gentleman who knows will, I hope, correct me.

Mr. GARRETT. Only incidentally.
Mr. HEPBURN. Only incidentally and occasionally, a gentleman tells me, is one of these boats to be seen. Now, gentleman tells me, is one of these boats to be seen. men, there is a reason for this. If we could not maintain this commerce upon the river when it existed, and when the opposition of the rail was inconsiderable, how can we hope to re-create it now, when we have the wonderful facilities that are to-day afforded us?

Mr. Chairman, we have supposed that we have found a corrective for the overcharge of the corporations. We have supposed that we have at last found means by which only compensatory and fair rates may be demanded from the shipper. I believe we have. I believe that the greatest blow that has been given to these projects of wastefulness has been given in the passage of the interstate-commerce laws of the country.

Our experience, our observation teach us that the steamboat, as an important factor in our transportation, is of the past. Most useful in its day, a wonderful help to the early settler, it can not compete with the facilities of the present.

Some gentlemen have referred to the Hennepin Canal. voted for the Hennepin Canal. I did it under pressure. railway cry was being raised—everybody that was not in favor of the Hennepin Canal, in the estimate of certain orators and certain newspapers, was an enemy to the public welfare and was wedded to the cormorants. I had not as much courage then as I ought to have had and I voted for it. There is not a man that is familiar with the route but what knows that a doubletrack railway along that line of canal not only has a greater carrying capacity but a cheaper carrying capacity than the canal, with its innumerable locks, up, up, up, I don't know how many steps. At one time it was contemplated that there would be sixty-seven up and down. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I did not expect to occupy any time to-day under the arrangement, but I do not complain. bill is of such proportions and proposes to make such a large appropriation, altogether out of proportion to any preceding one, and much larger, I understand, than all the appropriations in like bills for more than seventy years after (1823) appropriations for rivers and harbors were commenced, and its number of places is so great that it startles certain people in this country. The total of appropriations made through such bills solely for rivers and harbors prior to 1896 was many millions less than is proposed by this bill. I shall not vote for the bill unless it contains some safeguards and restrictions; and now, to that end, I send to the Clerk's desk to have read what I propose, if permitted to propose anything, in the form of an additional section to the bill

The CHAIRMAN. The proposed amendment will be read in the time of the gentleman.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add as a new section the following:

The several appropriations made by section 1 of this act are made subject of the right of the Secretary of War, with the approval of the President of the United States, to appoint a board of inspection consisting of three engineer officers of the United States Army not lower in rank than captain, which board shall, if deemed necessary by the Secretary of War, with like approval, visit any place he may designate which it is proposed by the provisions of this act to improve and there fully investigate the same and report in writing to the Secretary of War as to the public necessity, utility, and practicability of the proposed improvement at the place so designated, and whether or not such improvement will, if made, result in substantial public benefit in promoting interstate or foreign trade or commerce, stating in a summary way the facts, if any, which, in its opinion, my tend to show such necessity, utility, and practicability and such public benefit, and setting forth as to each place designated its situation and condition in respect to such trade or commerce by water transportation at the time the report is made and what its situation and condition would be in such respect should the proposed improvement be made; also showing in what way, if any, the general public through increased trade or commerce will be benefited; also showing how the common defense or general welfare will be promoted, if at all, by the proposed expenditure of money at such place, and setting forth such other things relating to such expenditure as the Secretary of War may deem important and require.

"Any such board appointed as aforesaid shall separately investigate."

require.

"Any such board appointed as aforesaid shall separately investigate and report on each place designated as aforesaid and referred to it for investigation; and more than one such board may be in existence at the same time.

"Upon the receipt of a report from such board the Secretary of War, with the approval of the President, shall have the right to limit the amount of money to be expended and by this act appropriated for the improvement of any place thus reported upon to a sum less than that so appropriated for such place, or to withhold the expenditure of any money appropriated by this act for such place.

"The necessary expenses incurred by any such board in making an investigation and report as to any place shall be paid out of the sum appropriated by this act for its improvement."

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the amendment proposed will be obvious to those who have given attention to its reading. Some of the great Presidents of the United States have taken the responsibility, when we have had excessive river and harbor appropriations and for local purposes, to refuse to and narbor appropriations and for local purposes, to refuse to allow all the money appropriated to be taken out of the Treasury and applied as appropriated. Now, I propose by this amendment to have a plan adopted to test, in case the Secretary of War finds it necessary, with the approval of the President, the practicability and utility and the necessity, etc., of such places as the Secretary may select. If the bill is a good one in all respects, there will be represent the secretary for the prepared of the prepared. respects, there will be no necessity of availing of the proposed provision. If it is a bad one, it will save to the country millions of money, probably, that we should expend in the preparation of this country to prevent war or otherwise appropriate usefully.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we are on, I believe, the third day of the debate on this bill, but I have heard, I think, from no source, from no party man, a murmur about the bill being unconstitutional in any of its provisions. Before I conclude I hope, Mr. Chairman, to turn back a little in the pages of the history of this country and see what the views of the great Presidents of the United States and great statesmen of this country were and what they have regarded as proper, legitimate, constitutional appropriations for internal improvements and for rivers and The bill, as a whole, I can not approve. It is favored, I understand, by all the members of this majestic Committee on Rivers and Harbors. I heard the distinguished chairman [Mr. Burron] say that it had received due consideration in all of its parts and had his approval. The distinguished gentleman [Mr. BANKHEAD] at the head of the minority of the committee, on the Democratic side, took occasion early in the history of this dis-cussion to say that he favored every line of the bill. He stands We have not heard from the gentlemen of the committee who have spoken whether or not they favor the many appropriations contained in the bill to the absolute and eternal exclusion of all the others that friends of river and harbor appropriations favor, but we must take it for granted, at least, that they regard the places proposed to be improved as of paramount importance to the great improvement which is suggested should be made by the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] and the other improvements that it is sought to have made by distinguished gentlemen from Pennsylvania, who represent a deeper channel in the waters at Philadelphia, and by the distinguished gentlemen who favor canals, etc., in the different parts of the country, all of which it is claimed, as I understand, have been grossly neglected and mistreated in the matter of appropriations proposed by this bill.

I know how unkind it will seem if I have the temerity to attack the general provisions of this bill. It has provisions in it that have excited some hostility among the friends of river and harbor appropriations. My distinguished friend from Missouri [Mr. Clark] told us yesterday that some of those who hitherto went in pairs [Mr. Burton and Mr. Bartholdt] and advocated universal peace have separated and come to blows, mentally at least, over this bill. So peace friends have parted and political friends have come together; the lion and the lamb have lain down together, and all that can get into the bill seem to have a peaceable disposition. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I represent a district that gets nothing, so I ought to be in a position to speak with some degree of impartiality. The great Calhoun long ago pronounced a little bit of a river and harbor bill "a bonus bill." I do not stop to characterize this large bill as a bonus bill," I do not stop to characterize this large bill as a bonus bill, but it certainly comes within that class that President Zachary Taylor called "an omnibus bill." But so far as my district is concerned of the accompanion of t proposed to be appropriated by the bill it is to get nothing. is a singular fact, Mr. Chairman, but it looks as though this committee had gone to the census of the United States, as shown by the census of 1900, and found out the population of the United States (84,233,069), and then sought to make up a bill that would, in the aggregate, appropriate for every man, woman, and child within the States exactly $1, for that is about where it runs. The amount carried by the bill, including cash, authorized expenditures, and for surveys, is $84,116,138. But my district don't get a dollar. Mine may be denominated as a district de bonus non [laughter], a district that gets no goods. But I have a little district out in central Ohio which is at all times deeply interested in the general welfare of this country.

It is small, I suppose, in proportion to the whole, but we have flowing through it both branches of the Big Miami River (the Stillwater branch and the main branch of that river), and we have flowing through it Mad River, which continuously throughout the year and in all seasons contains more than many of the streams that are mentioned in the bill. Then there is Buck (Lagonda) Creek, Honey Creek, Donnels Creek, Massie Creek, Darby Creek, Deer Creek, and Paint Creek, and the Little Miami River, and the Scioto River with its tributaries. Some of these were originally put down as navigable streams. I was born at the head of navigation on Mad River in Ohio. Flatboats were there once loaded and sent to New Orleans, transporting corn, wheat, flour, pork, and whisky. Later the water was utilized for other, if not better, uses. It furnished Later the the power to propel mills to grind the vast crops of wheat, rye, corn, etc., which grew on the exceptionally rich land along that river. Much of the corn was distilled into pure whisky. For many years a traveler along this stream would not be out of sight of a mill, and could enjoy continually the fresh funces of a distillery. The same conditions existed in times past on the Miami and Scioto. Though a great change has come, still the people prosper without asking for Federal aid to deepen the channels of their streams and thereby convert them into arteries of commerce, and private funds build the railroads for transportation.

We have also in my little district two canals—one the Miami and Erie Canal, which extends north and south through Ohio, from Toledo on the north, passing through the cities of Piqua and Troy and Tippecanoe City, in my district, continuing down the great Miami through Dayton, Hamilton, etc., to Cincinnati, and passing through the richest country in agricultural products of any in the world; and then we have a canal extending south from Columbus through the eastern part of my district along the Scioto, and its valley and the adjacent country are equally rich. We have a network of railroads in our country and through my district, such as the Big Four, the Pennsylvania, the Detroit, Toledo and Ironton steam roads, and numerous electric traction lines. And we have cities where we manufacture, and according to statistics a few years ago my little city of Springfield produced more per capita in value of manufactured products than any other known place in the world, and I can now add to it the smaller city of Piqua, also in my district, where a like condition now exists. There are other cities in my district engaged in manufacture and all kinds of trade. With all our great facilities for transportation our manufacturers and shippers still complain constantly of want of cars. Our business has outgrown the capacity of the railroads on the lines of the greatest systems.

If we had water transportation that was speedy enough to attract the business of the shipper, it might cheapen freight rates and be responsive to our large and growing business. I seriously doubt whether the slow movement of goods on canals and rivers will ever again attract the general freight business of this country. Most certainly it will not so long as the present pace we have set for ourselves obtains attract the traveling public.

In my district we are not hoping for or expecting mere local aid by the Federal Government. I do not believe such aid is constitutional, and if constitutional I do not deem it practical or Manifestly such aid can not even generally be extended through expenditures of the General Government, and it is plainly unjust to appropriate in local aid of some places to the When we do this, as will be done in cerexclusion of others. tain instances if this bill passes, we are necessarily unwarrant-

There are improvements of State and international impor-tance that should be made. The connection of the Ohio River and Lake Erie was advocated as of national importance by both Washington and Jefferson, even before the adoption of the ordinance of 1787.

By improving the Miami and Erie Canal, which extends many miles through my district, by widening and deepening it from Lake Erie (Toledo) to the Ohio (Cincinnati) so that ships of commerce could traverse it, the Great Lakes and the Gulf of Mexico would be linked together, and the commerce of and with all parts of the world would flow through it. A ship could be loaded at Chicago, Cleveland, Toledo, etc., and sent to London, England, or to any other port in the world. This would be both interstate and international commerce, and an appropriation for the construction of such a canal would be free of constitutional objections. But such a work is too important, it seems, to have attention now, and it is passed by like other and possibly more important improvements which are not mentioned, or, if mentioned, not adequately appropriated for in this bill. I shall, however, when opportunity comes, offer an amendment to this bill authorizing a survey for a ship canal over the line of the Miami and Erie Canal from the Ohio River at Cincinnati to Lake Erie at Toledo.

Perhaps the other canal (Ohio Canal and its feeders) mentioned as passing through my district could be extended and improved in like manner, producing similar results. But Raccoon Creek and Duck Creek must first be attended to, regardless of constitutional questions, and apparently regardless of cost or of results.

I do not deny the right under the Constitution or the importance and necessity of improving the harbors on the Great Lakes and the channel of the Ohio River. These and like improvements furnish no warrant for appropriating the money of the Federal Treasury to improve purely local places wholly within a State, such as short rivers, inlets, etc., where no commerce naturally exists. Their improvement in favored localities is invidious, and the use of large sums for the purpose prevents the improvement of those of real and national importance. Twelve of the States of the Union are not allowed any appropriation by the bill-Iowa among the number. Thirty-three of the States are to be remembered, and they unequally, with the 'bonus."

As my district, thus situated, gets nothing-on the population basis (to say nothing of business or wealth of production) it should get about $200,000—I have cited it as an example of the inequality and injustice that are proposed. The chairman of the committee, in his remarks three days ago, said:

The smaller streams which may be called distinctly local are not omitted in the bill. Some question may be raised as to the propriety of improving a mere local stream at national expense. Great care should be used, no doubt, to exclude creeks and rivers so insignificant as to give no promise of favorable results. But I desire to say to the committee that the appropriations made for many of these little streams have been quite as beneficial as any river and harbor appropriations that have been made. have been made.

In the present bill appropriation is made for some streams of this class where no traffic has already developed. In some cases a considerable commerce will follow, but that which is recommended for these local streams where there is an existing traffic is not materially in excess of the amount in the bill in 1902.

He gives in his speech the tonnage per year of Raccoon Creek, New Jersey, Duck Creek, Delaware, and others, as illustrations of such local streams "not omitted," some of which would not require a good ship five days a year to do all its

Some of the streams mentioned in the bill are not to have more than 3 feet of water when improved.

The examples just given show that it still happens that some are taken and more are left.

The proposed appropriations in the bill do not pretend to be for the common defense or general welfare, except a few of them. The total number of places sought to be appropriated for are 346, and it is proposed by this bill to appropriate for them all, great and small—harbors and rivers and creeks—$83,816,138; and it is also proposed by the second section of the bill to appropriate $300,000 for preliminary examinations and surveys other than that mentioned in the first section of the bill, and for contingencies and incidental repairs, for which there is no appropriation for rivers and harbors, and this contemplates a further large appropriation. The first river and harbor bill was passed May 3, 1823, and thereafter for many years appropriations for rivers and harbors were made by tacking on small appropriations, acting in those days as we sometimes do now, with general appropriation bills. Later on, Congress changed to passing regular river and harbor appropriation bills.

In 1870 the bill was for $3,975,900; in 1875, $6,648,517.50; in 1880, $8,976,500; in 1881, $11,451,000, and in 1882, $18,743,875, and the bill for the last appropriation was vetoed by President Arthur. The later ones were: In 1896, $72,275,954.91; in 1899, $39,958,166.06; in 1902, $65,107,602; in 1905, $35,366,533.04, and the bill under consideration now reaches $84,116,138, if it shall The largest river and harbor bill ever passed become a law. and became a law was passed by a Democratic Congress in Cleveland's Administration in 1896. It exceeded by more than

If there is any basis for a great number of the places for which it is proposed now to make appropriations, it must rest on the assumed right to make internal improvements; but I understand from the remarks of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors that some of these places are proposed to be improved for the purpose of making them harbors of refuge—Cape May, for instance. My friend, who advocates appropriating nothing for defense of this country on its coast and in its island possessions, ought to have looked farther within the continent of this country before he sought to appropriate money for mere harbors of refuge along the Atlantic coast. We will need our harbors of refuge in the interior, where the yeomanry of the country can defend whatever we have there, if we don't stop long enough to appropriate to protect our coast and coast lines.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that my colleague yield here, because of another order for the day.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has thirty-five minutes remaining. I understand he yields to his colleague, who will move that the committee do now rise. The gentleman will retain the floor.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Currier, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 24991, the river and harbor appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. TAL-BOTT] offers a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended that op-ortunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. ARTHUR PUE GORMAN, late a United States Senator from the State of Maryland. The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the reso-

The question was taken; and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. TALBOTT. Mr. Speaker, Senator ARTHUR PUE GORMAN was born March 11, 1839. His father was of Irish descent and was a prominent merchant and contractor, with large influence in Democratic politics in Howard County, Md., where the late Senator was born. His mother, whose maiden name was Elizabeth Brown, was the descendant of one of the oldest and most prominent families in Howard County, and occupied a conspicuous place before and during the Revolutionary period. the age of 13 Mr. Gorman was appointed a page in the United States Senate, I am informed, upon the recommendation of the Hon. Stephen A. Douglas, who always manifested a decided interest in him. His was a public school education, acquired in his native county, and while limited, by the unaided power of his own personality he attained places of power and distinction. He was promoted from page to postmaster of the Senate, which position he occupied until September 1, 1866, at which time he was removed because of activity in the cause of President Johnson during his noted impeachment trial. Immediately after his removal as postmaster of the Senate President Johnson appointed him collector of internal revenue for the fifth district of Maryland. This office Mr. GORMAN filled until after the inauguration of President Grant, in 1869. In that year he was elected a member of the house of delegates of Maryland, was reelected in 1871, and at the session of 1872 was elected speaker of the house. In June, 1872, he was elected president of the Chesa-peake and Ohio Canal, and in 1875 was elected to the State senate from Howard County; was elected in January, 1880, to the United States Senate, reelected in 1886 and 1892, and was again chosen Senator in 1902. It will thus be seen that promotion followed fast throughout his entire life—from page to post-master, from member to speaker of the Maryland house of delegates, from State senator to United States Senator.

This rapid promotion was because of his extraordinary ability being recognized by those with whom he came in contact in the many positions he occupied. I remember that very shortly after Senator Gorman began his first term in the Senate, the Hon. James B. Beck, of Kentucky, inquired of me where we found our junior Senator. I replied:

We did not find him; he made himself known, and the people made him Senator.

Senator Beck then said:

The legislature of Maryland may have made mistakes in former times hen they elected Senators, but this time made no mistake.

At that time Senator Beck was chairman of the Democratic caucus. This, from such a source, was praise indeed, and showed that Mr. Gorman had already made an impression on the Senate—an impression that grew by steps until he became the undisputed leader of his party and one of the greatest parliamen-tarians our Government has known. The Hon. James G. Blaine, in his magnificent eulogy on President Garfield, delivered from the Speaker's chair February 27, 1882, said:

The three most distinguished parliamentary leaders hitherto developed in this country are Mr. Clay, Mr. Douglas, and Mr. Thaddeus Stevens. They were all men of consummate ability, of great earnestness, of intense personality, differing widely each from the others and yet with a single trait in common—the power to command.

He said it would be difficult to rank with these a fourth name in all of our Congressional history. To this most distinguished group I would add Senator ARTHUR PUE GORMAN.

Mr. Gorman's greatest claim to be added to that list rests upon his masterful fight as party leader in the Senate against the Republican attempt to enact the so-called "force bill." bill was in charge of the late Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts, a strong debater and accomplished parliamentarian. The vote to take up the bill for consideration on December 3, 1890, was—yeas 41, nays 30. The contest was continuous from that date until the 22d of January, 1891, when the bill was displaced on the motion of Senator Wolcott, of Colorado, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill making an apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the Eleventh Census, the vote upon which motion wasyeas 35, nays 34. During the seven weeks' consideration of the bill, Mr. Gorman occupied the floor for a considerable time himself, was the recognized leader of the minority, and managed the parliamentary features of the debate. During the aged the parliamentary features of the debate. During the contest and discussion of the proposed legislation the people of the country came to realize that it was not wise legislation and not in the interest of the entire country, and six able Republican Senators became likewise impressed. The adoption of the force bill would have called a halt on the prosperity of the South, the section of the country against which it was specially aimed. and would have relegated it again to the sort of government it suffered in the days of reconstruction; in fact, no man can tell how disastrous its adoption would have been to the whole Its defeat gave the South renewed courage and confidence in the future. Millions of dollars traveled that way from all sections to be invested, new railroads were built, old lines extended, cotton mills were erected, steel plants sprang up; in fact, the development of the various interests of the South has been so rapid that the railroad lines now in operation in that section are unequal to transporting its cotton, steel, and various products, and general prosperity reigns.

The deceased Senator is entitled to the gratitude of every patriotic citizen, and especially of the people of the Southland. If he had rendered us no other public service this of itself ought to be sufficient to entitle him to the gratitude of the entire American people. This feeling in his own State was so great that when the Democratic State convention met in 1891 Mr. GORMAN was unanimously named as the candidate of his party for the Senate, a thing without precedent in the politics of Maryland, and in further recognition of his great services he was presented a handsome silver service, paid for by his admirers in the State.

Mr. Gorman was an ideal husband and father, and no man in public life enjoyed home surroundings more thoroughly than he, more especially when he could leave Washington and return to his country home in Howard County, where he would enjoy farm life and his family without the constant interruptions of visitors and callers on all kinds of public and private business. He often remarked that this country life, surrounded by his family, was the greatest relief to him—more relief than could be well imagined by one in private life. The Senator was charitable in every sense of the word, and never was known to refuse to contribute to the relief of those in want and trouble. He took special care to see that the families of his tried and true friends were properly taken care of, and assisted in the way calculated to do the most good. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the language used by Mr. Gorman in his eulogy on Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts, could be properly applied at this time to himself:

He was a man of pure and stainless life; he could feel for the victims of temptation. Mixed in his own creed, he was ever ready to recognize the sincerity of those who preached a different faith.

Mr. Gorman labored most intelligently and constantly, and mastered every question and its details with which he had to deal. Without ever having studied law he could put the proper construction on a legislative or Congressional enactment. thoroughly understood and could with great force discuss all public questions. He was prophetic on at least one important question. He was the first public man to my knowledge who declared publicly that the question of transportation and the control of railroad corporations would have to be dealt with by Congress.

He was ever grateful to the people of his native State who had so frequently honored him, and was largely instrumental in securing for them great and needed improvements.

As Senator in addition to looking after the material interests of the State and city of Baltimore he was not unmindful of the claims of private citizens and gave prompt attention to all matters to which they called his attention. Senator Gorman had enemies—all public men have had them in the past, and all public men will have them in the future-but the compensation in his case was, he had hosts of warm, true friends, always ready and willing to assist him in his battles, who now confess their great loss and pay tribute to his memory and rejoice in the life he lived so well, so usefully, and so honorably. He was extremely courteous in manner and one of the most attractive men it has ever been my fortune to know, accessible at all times to the humble citizen as well as to the citizen of wealth and prominence. All who came in contact with him became at once impressed with the fact that he was a great deal more than the ordinary man. We all miss him and mourn his loss, and will continue to do so while life lasts, especially those who were his almost daily companions and enjoyed his confidence and affec-

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. TAL-BOTT] will please take the chair.

Mr. TALBOTT assumed the chair.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I have been asked to say a word touching the life and services of the late ARTHUR PUE GORMAN. The Master said on one occasion, when one who ought to have accompanied him gave an excuse that his father was dead and he must needs go and bury him, "Let the dead bury their dead." And as the life of a generation on an average is under 40 years, this rule must necessarily be observed. Otherwise the world would be one vast house of mourning and the race would not make progress. And yet, when those cross the river with whom we have associated, to the family and friends and associates of the deceased the crossing begets sorrow, mourning, and regret, and the practice grows of paying a tribute where it is deserved to those who have crossed over.

I had many years of service in the House coincident to the service of Senator Gorman in the Senate. I became very well acquainted with him personally as well as in a legislative capac-My service upon the House Committee on Appropriations and his service, among other committees of the Senate, upon the Senate Committee on Appropriations, brought me frequently in association with him. That was true toward the close of the session, when representing the House in conference, together with my colleagues, with Senator Gorman and his colleagues upon the conference committee representing the Senate, for the settlement of differences between the two bodies. In fact, I may say that my acquaintance began with him in consequence of work of that kind. I could bear cheerful testimony, if it were needed—I think the world knows it without my bearing such testimony, however-that he brought to his work in a remarkable degree sincerity of purpose and a desire for service to the people of the United States in his legislative capacity. He not only brought great intelligence, great culture, great knowledge, great integrity, but he also brought great industry. Legislative duties in both House and Senate are somewhat varied.

There is a sentiment throughout the country to be conserved or created, and it is very important indeed from the party standpoint and from the standpoint of the best interests of the Republic that there should be a just and correct sentiment, that is frequently nurtured, sometimes, I may say, created, by the debates in the two bodies, publicity being given by the press. There the man who abounds in oratory, with fitting words to clothe the ideas that he may have, becomes valuable. But, after all, with the newspapers universal, I think the capacity to discuss public questions, as compared with the capacity to understand public business, and without display or oratory consider it, where one is in condition to assist materially in its transaction, perhaps is a more valuable factor than the other factor of creating public sentiment. I do not aim to minimize either of these factors. Senator Gorman as a debater was strong and forceful and clear, but, in my judgment, his ability, his tact, his industry, and his knowledge in the conference room touching daily transactions in legislation were, to say least of it, equal to his ability as a debater in the Senate of the Sometimes it is fashionable in the country, if we can not think of anything else to say, to cartoon or to put a humorous little bit in the newspapers, if they need a stickful, sometimes a fling with or without malice, as it may be, at the Congress of the United States. We are not all Solomons in either the House or the Senate, nor are we all Websters, nor are we all GORMANS.

But, measuring my words, after some length of service in the House of Representatives and in contact with the Senate, I believe those two great bodies in their personnel average the picked men of the Republic. I refer to this at this time because most of the valuable service that a Senator or a Representative performs for the Republic is a service of which the world does not know. Frequently the average reader, being interested in other matters touching the acquiring of his daily bread and performing his duty as a private citizen, if he reads about and performing his duty as a private citizen, if he reads about it at all does not understand, or does not take the trouble to understand. It is not interesting. In other words, as the common expression is, "it will not read itself." In my judgment this great son of Maryland, who has crossed over, in his splendid and magnificent service in the Senate of the United States is entitled to more credit for the things that never caught the public attention than he is for the magnificent service which commanded the public attention and the public approval.

I said a moment ago that the average life of a generation is under forty years. An old epitaph in Cheltenham churchyard puts into the mouth of an infant who died at the age of three weeks the couplet-

It is so soon that I am done for, I wonder what I was begun for.

And it seems that all of us at times feel like asking that question. But we are so situated that while we do stay such is the necessity for effort that we may live and be subsisted, and care for those of the household and those who are to follow, and to pay our debt to civilization from the standpoint of reputation and from the standpoint of an honest desire to perform our funcand from the standpoint of an honest desire to perform our function and do our part, we are content to do the best we can; and when the end comes, in my judgment, that man is a happy man who has been in public life and who can say, "Well, it is now behind me, but in my day, to the best of my ability, I contributed to the progress of the Republic and of civilization as I was given to see the right." I believe ARTHUR PUE GORMAN, as he crossed over, had the right to make that declaration.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, it is probable that almost every Representative and Senator who was never much in Washington prior to his election to Congress forms a some-what definite opinion from afar as to the chief actors in this political and legislative scene; but after he has been here long enough to observe and study them at short range he will be compelled by the unimpeachable evidence of his own senses to modify his verdict in many cases, always to his surprise, sometimes with delight, and sometimes with regret.

Public men may be divided roughly into three classes: Those equal to their reputations, those bigger than their reputations, and those smaller than their reputations.

ARTHUR PUE GORMAN at a distance, as described by the voice of fame, was a pleasing, a commanding figure. He grew on one from personal contact and close inspection. His handsome presence, his winsome manners, his exquisite courtesy—which was ingrained, not put on and off as a garment—his thoughtful and unfailing kindness to newcomers, his unsur-passed tact, his rare equipoise, his wise counsel when sought by even the humblest Member, his splendid powers as a conversa-tionalist, all tended to enhance the high estimate one had formed of him from the public press and from the Congres-SIONAL RECORD.

I want to interpolate at this point a matter suggested by the very fine speech of Mr. Speaker Cannon. In the Christmas holidays of 1899 the Southern Railroad gave the Gridiron Club an excursion to Charleston, S. C. Going down and coming back they were the guests of the road; in Charleston they were the guests of the city; and I never in my life had a more enjoyable trip. The club invited Senator Tillman, Senator Depen, and myself to go along and make speeches, though as a matter of fact several members of the club could have made better speeches

On that trip I propounded this query to the members of the club one night, and I did it because our reputations here depend very largely on what the newspapers say. I asked them how it was that you might take two men who on the whole were of about the same abilities and same influence in this House or in the Senate and they were always exploiting one of them and the senate and they were always exploiting one of them and never exploiting the other. I said that I had no reason to complain, because I thought I had had my full share of exploitation. At first they denied the proposition. They said it was not true. Then I gave them a few samples that had fallen under my own observation; and at last they gave this answer: That they supposed it must be true; that one man's style of speaking was epigrammatic or anecdotal; they could take an extract from that speech and make good reading news of it, while another man might make an equally good speech for the purposes of legislation, but it was one they could not treat that way. And they came to the conclusion that that is really the reason why some Members of the House and some Senators always figure in the newspapers, while some others of equal capacity and of equal influence scarcely appear in them at all.

Early impressions are never effaced. My father was an enthusiast touching phrenology and physiognomy. He was an omnivorous reader, and among the periodicals in which he delighted and which he recommended to me as mental pabulum in my youth was the Phrenological Journal, published by Fowler & Wells. My favorite teacher in the common schools was a professional phrenologist. With such early guides it was inevitable that I should all my days be a student of the human face It is a most fascinating recreation. While I have long since abandoned the theory that one may determine what is on the inside of a man's head by feeling the bumps on the outside, I still adhere to the belief that there is much in both phrenology and physiognomy. God writes a man's character and capacity in his face. To some his handwriting is perfectly legible; to others it is an inscrutable mystery. Alexander Pope uttered an important truth when he said:

The proper study of mankind is man.

Some men are so ugly and ungainly that it is a positive advantage to them as public speakers by reason of the pleasurable surprise which their eloquence or logic or learning excites in their hearers. Others are so prepossessing that they have won the hearts of their audience before they have opened their mouths. To this latter category Senator Gorman undoubtedly For some occult psychological reason we never or belonged. rarely speak of manly beauty. By common consent and immemorial custom we use the word "beautiful" as descriptive of the females of our race. In the case of males we substitute the word "handsome." Senator Gorman was the handsomest man of his time. In my goings to and fro I have seen only two as handsome—Gen. John Cabell Breckinridge, who was Vice-President and who in all probability would have been President of the Republic but for the war between the States, and John Henry Neville, my professor of Greek at Kentucky University, who divided all mankind into Greeks and barbarians. To look upon the countenance of any of this distinguished trio was a feast for the eyes.

With the dead there is no rivalry; hence I can say these things without offense. Proof conclusive of Senator Gorman's handsomeness is this: In Washington there is a company whose chief business is the making of cuts to illustrate newspapers, magazines, periodicals, and books. For the purpose of advertising its work it always sends out cuts of the superb head and face of Senator Gorman.

His cast of features was Greek-such as Phidias would have delighted to commemorate in marble and Apelles to reproduce on canvas. His intellect possessed all the subtlety of the Greek mind in the palmy days of the Athenian philosophers.

Of moderns, he resembled Talleyrand rather than Napoleon.

He was a diplomatist of the highest order-a most skillful manager of men-the most consummate parliamentary leader of his Others excelled him in eloquence, in learning, in debating ability, and in power of repartee, but in strategy he overtopped them all. To him is peculiarly applicable the old Latin dictum, "Suaviter in modo, fortiter in re." To use an expression homely but full of meaning, he "took things by the smooth handle.

He rose to the leadership of the Senate Democrats not by self-seeking, but by reason of his universally acknowledged fitness for that high and onerous position.

His defeat of the Lodge "force bill" must ever be regarded as one of the most brilliant victories achieved by any minority leader in the history of Congress. It so endeared him to the southern people that they would have gladly made him President, though they differed with him on more than one important matter of policy; and the chances are that he would have won that distinction, the ne plus ultra of human ambition, had he been en rapport with the Democracy of the West on the tariff and financial questions. It is generally believed that he threw away the Presidency at Chicago in 1892 by refusing to permit his friends to make a fight for him. No adequate the content of the refused here were the production of the content of the c quate explanation of his refusal has ever been vouchsafed to us-perhaps never will be.

Outside the Senate his masterpiece was the successful management of the Presidential campaign of 1884. It was a most brilliant performance and entitles him to a place in the very front rank of American political leaders. There is little doubt that had he been chairman of the national committee in 1888 Grover Cleveland would have been reelected and the current of our history changed for years—it may be forever. Whether, on the whole, the history of our country for the last nineteen years would be more pleasant to contemplate is a question about which men will differ and which I will not argue on this occasion; but surely it is not inapropos or in bad taste to say that had Cleveland been reelected in 1888 two momentous subsequent events would not have happened—the passage of the McKinley tariff bill and the election of William McKinley to the Presidency—for it must be clear to the philosophical student of our-history that while the McKinley tariff law, assisted by a gerry-mander of Ohio, eliminated McKinley from Congress, the same causes made him governor twice and sent him to the White House for two terms. It is altogether probable that McKinley was greatly cast down by his defeat for Congress in 1890. If so, when he delivered his optimistic second inaugural address, March 4, 1901, if he gave any thought to that defeat, he must have clearly realized the truth of the old saying that "seeming calamities are sometimes blessings in disguise.'

First and last there has been much philosophizing as to how frequently in this world great events hinge upon small ones—so small, in fact, as to appear trifles light as air. In one of the finest passages in his delightful lectures on the "Four Georges"—and there is no nobler prose in our vernacular—William Makepeace Thackeray tells how in 1715 James Stuart failed to gain the Three Kingdoms because certain of his adherents who were to escalade Edinburgh Castle stopped to drink his health in a tavern in Edinburgh town and arrived two hours too late at the rendezvous under the castle walls.

So it may be said that but for the Cleveland-Gorman feud Cleveland might have been reelected in 1888; Democratic policies might have been reclected in 1893, beindefatt por-cies might have been put in force; Cleveland would not have been reelected in 1892, for Democrats are unalterably opposed to a third term for any man; and if Democratic policies had proved acceptable, we would have conducted the affairs of the Republic Who was to blame for the quarrel betwixt for many years. those two conspicuous men, so unlike in mind, method, training, and careers, I am not trying to settle now-it would be out of place; but I most heartily commend it to the historian of our times as the turning point in our politics ever since and perhaps for decades yet to come. I hope, however, that I may be pardoned this comment—that to think of what has been and then of what might have been is enough to make a Democrat sick at

Mr. Gorman was a protégé of Stephen A. Douglas and took his first political lessons out of the book of that remarkable man. It is strictly within the bounds of truth to say that the pupil was worthy of the master. Both led their party in the Senate in stirring times, and each narrowly missed the highest political honor when it seemed almost within his grasp.

If Senator Gorman ever experienced any disappointment or felt any bitterness because of his failure to reach the Presidency, he gave no sign, but went on serenely, courteously, and with dignity until the final summons came.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, the career of the late Senator Gorman in its historical and biographical aspects has been dwelt upon ably and in detail in both Houses of Congress yesterday and to-day, and he occupied such a large place in the National Legislature and was so intimately connected with many great events during his long service at the Capitol, which, with his part therein, will go down in American history, that it is neither necessary nor desirable for me to refer even in the briefest way to what he was and did as a Senator of the United States.

As a Representative from Maryland I rise here to pay a feeble tribute to his memory, impelled by the knowledge that the people of my district wish me upon this sad occasion to join in recalling the virtues of the dead, and this tribute, inadequate as it is, is an expression, too, of the personal sorrow of one who was proud to possess the friendship of that son of Maryland whose vacant seat in the Senate echoed the vacancy in the hearts of his people.

Measured by his accomplishments in the other end of the Capitol, Mr. GORMAN's name will stand high upon the roll of Maryland Senators. It was his good fortune that the best part of his public life was cast in a period when the work at hand was fitted to his eminent abilities, to his shrewdness in debate, his wisdom in council, and his unrivaled political generalship. It is these qualities for which he will be remembered and his usefulness in the Senate and to the country as a statesman of well-poised and practical talents, a usefulness so long and so widely recognized, can never fade from the record of American national legislation.

Industry and self-reliance were distinguishing traits of the page whose patron was Douglas as they were of the Senator when he had gained the same heights upon which the figure of Douglas had been the object of his boyish admiration. All through his life Mr. Gorman was a hard worker, and in the earlier portion of it largely dependent upon his own efforts and capabilities, and from this viewpoint his career teaches with silent force the lesson of the cardinal characteristics which have always been the root of the development and perfecting of the individual in our American leaders.

Mr. Gorman was a lovable man, as thousands can testify, and the man as he was known in yonder Senate was the same man as he was known in the lowliest walks of life. In personal intercourse he was kindly and generous, and amid all the disillusionments and sometimes sordid scenes of political strife which, more than most men, it was his lot to encounter he still preserved a gentle and winning manner and a sweetness of temper which endeared him to his friends and acquaintances and shed a beneficent influence upon all with whom he came in contact. We, with many others, have seen and wondered at the composure, the grave courtesy, the kindliness of speech and of thought and of action which, whether in public gatherings, friendly or otherwise, or in the shelter of our homes and his, charmed and soothed.

In the varied private relations of life, in that environment where one is really tested as to true and unshaded character, Mr. Gorman uniformly exhibited, and to a very marked degree, all the virtues which bless the spheres of family and friendship.

His mortal body is hidden forever from our sight by the grave, but from its darkness and silence blooms, and will forever bloom for us, the memory of his goodness, of his greatness, and of his patriotism.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, Senator Gorman was, in common parlance, a self-made man. He had, by long contact with public men and public affairs, an extensive knowledge of men and things. This knowledge, with his splendid endowment of common sense, his unflinching integrity, his sympathy for all, his gentleness and innate modesty, qualified him for the duties of life, whether to the State or to society, and made him a very popular citizen and official and a beloved husband and father. To know him was to love him. His official life has been largely dwelt upon in these services, both here and in the Senate. was an official conservative, safe, and successful, hence his designation as a leader in the Senate and his political party as well as his fast hold upon his people in his native State. But for his modesty or lack of aggressiveness he would have headed the ticket for President as a representative of the national Democratic party. He was an old-fashioned Democrat, without the taint of many new-fangled notions called "principles," so common at this day. He certainly held that the Government was by the people, from the people, and for the people-a simple Democrat. His counsel and advice were sought and utilized by the leaders in his political party generally, and on more than one occasion when his counsel was not followed came defeat. He was a manly man, and, indeed, when he fell asleep a great man had fallen—great in his party, great in his official position as a Senator, great, in the broad sense, as a citizen of this great and growing country, and while we can no longer look upon his pleasant and cheerful face nor seek his counsel or leadership, yet his works, his words, and life are left us that we may in coming generations admire and follow in his footsteps.

[Mr. CLAYTON addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. TOWNE. Mr. Speaker, I am profoundly grateful for the opportunity of participating in the tribute which this House, in obedience to an ancient and honorable custom, to-day pays to the memory of the distinguished late Senator from Maryland. I had not the opportunity of quite so close and long association with the late Senator Gorman in public life as had some of those gentlemen who have already participated in this com-memoration. But I enjoyed for a number of years the honor of a close personal acquaintance with him, and I received from him so many proofs of regard and confidence that this occasion has for me the sanction of a privilege as well as of a duty. Unfortunately, it has not been possible for me, in the rush of other duties, to make that preparation for this occasion which its solemnity and interest and my own inclination impart to it, but fortunately that is a lack that will not be felt.

The addresses that are to be and that have already been made here this afternoon will more than supplement any imperfection in what I myself might say. I have been particularly instructed and interested by the illuminating address of the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Clark], who never touches with deliberation anything that he does not ornament, and I can subscribe most heartily to the verdict he has given on the personality, the genius, and the public services of our distinguished friend.

Personally, as others have testified, and as everybody who knew him well must testify, Senator Gorman was a man of most delightful manners. Pleasure always shone upon his face when he met a friend. He was sincere, democratic, modest, with a real and not affected dignity. He always bore himself with that nice equipoise appropriate at once to the genial friend and the occupant of exalted public station. In respect of those qualities which gave him his influence among men perhaps it may be well to specify as chief among all his sincerity, his absolute reliabil-His word could always be depended upon wherever he gave it under circumstance that made it possible of performance.

He believed thoroughly in the importance of duties and functions of the legislative branch of the Government. He took his official oath seriously. There have been few so strenuous and able defenders of the prerogatives of the Senate and of the independence of the legislative department of the Government as Senator Gorman was. He knew that the practical work of legislation every day during a session of Congress demands the careful scrutiny of those who are responsible for it, a scrutiny which must always be bestowed by somebody upon the course of procedure in either body, but which seldom rewards the assiduity and attention of the conscientious legislator with anything beyond that consciousness of duty well performed, which is, perhaps, after all the chief reward for the doing of any good thing.

In debate Senator Gorman's mastery of the subject-matter; his skill in dialectic; his direct, succinct method of statement; his interesting and captivating voice and presence, made him an ally to be valued and an opponent to be feared. ment for legislative work was considerable, although not so fully rounded as might have been the case had he early enjoyed wider academic opportunities. His experience in minor positions in the service of the Senate, his acquaintance with the great political leaders of his time, the earnestness with which he early threw himself into the political activities of his party, his great memory, his natural logical power of classification and inference, equipped him for the purpose of enforcing policies and securing legislation as few contemporaries

His style was direct and forcible. The distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Clark] has submitted some observa-tions, of characteristic force and interest, upon the subject of oratory, a word that in my judgment is often misapplied. bave known many excellent speakers, but very few orators, and still fewer great orators. Senator GORMAN perhaps never could have been a great orator. Temperamentally he had not that power of self-infusion into his subject, that magnetism, that compelling force which characterizes masters of the art of persuasion.

But in power of statement, in knowledge of what his auditor ought to hear, in ability to state it so that his auditor could not fail to understand it, and in so relating the parts of his dis-course as to make them converge to the conclusion that he desired, he was a man possessed of very considerable art, no small part of the art of oratory. Referring now to temperamental characteristics, and recognizing fully the difference between the two men, his method was more like that of Alexander Hamilton than, let us say, like that of Patrick Henry. His effect was the effect of the reason rather than of the imagination. His appeal was to the judgment rather to the feelings. The very highest oratory, of course, embraces both. It is very seldom that a man possesses both structural capacity and ornamental power. Like great architecture, true oratory is at once struc-tural and beautiful. When it is fundamentally structural, with its beauty incident to its structure, it then approaches to the perfection which we find illustrated in very few of the greatest masters, like Demosthenes and Daniel Webster. It certainly is no impugnment of a man that he did not reach, as a parliamentary debater, the stature of the highest examples in that kind; but as a practical legislative leader, as a manager and a tactician, it is altogether probable that we have not seen among his contemporaries in either branch of the National Congress the equal of the distinguished Senator from Maryland.

As a leader in the field of general politics in the country he was a man eminent for his tact, for his understanding of the political situation in every quarter of the Republic, for his ability to marshal his forces and use them, and above all, according to my own observation and judgment, for that peculiar capacity that has distinguished only really great men, of dis-counting temporary misinformation, of declining to be guided by momentary caprice or misled by the hasty conclusions of subordinates, particularly when of a startling or an alarming character. Emerson has somewhere spoken of the necessity and importance of learning what the hours are saying to the centuries; and oftentimes a man whose ears are filled with the hubbub of controversy in his immediate vicinity forgets the larger lessons of time and, moved by a local disturbance, may wreck principles of national extent. Senator Gorman was a man who was never flushed by rumor, who never lost his head. When others were dismayed, he was invariably his own master, calm, cool, collected, and resourceful, able to apply all the lessons of his accumulated valuable experience to the immediate problem of a pressing emergency; one of the greatest qualifications for polit-others have spoken and this relieves me from the necessity of doing so at any length, Mr. Speaker, of the connection of Senator Gorman with certain specific acts of legislation. Attention has been properly called to the great patriotic service he performed in that long contest, demanding a greater exercise of political sagacity, tact, and strategy than perhaps any other parliamentary fight in our own or any other legislative history, by which the "force bill," as it has been properly called, was finally defeated—a service in which, I believe, the dominant opinion of the country to-day approves the feeling with which the South at the time greeted this tremendous victory. Reference has been made also to the tariff legislation in which Senator Gorman took so active a part. I happen to know the Senator's convictions upon the general subject of the tariff. I have no sort of sympathy with that criticism which represents Senator Gorman as a sort of Mephistopheles or Richelieu who pretended to favor one thing while he intended to do another. His views upon the tariff question were never disguised in any particular. He never claimed to be a free trader, but openly avowed his belief that we can not frame a tariff system based upon the language of the general-welfare clause of the Con-stitution, but that such incidental protection as the imposition of duties gives to the industries of the country is strictly appurtenant to the revenue power.

The contention was that the statesman must consider conditions as they exist at the time of his legislation. He was a very practical man. He was not for an instant a slave to priori or doctrinaire abstractions. He set to work to frame a bill which should raise an adequate revenue without disturbing American industries. Senator Gorman was a diplomat. It is true that he was not in the habit of issuing proclamations announcing what he was about to do. He never went about his business, when it was important business, heralded by a brass band. But there is a good deal of difference, Mr. Speaker, between reticence as to what your purposes are and pretense as to what they are not. Mr. Gorman's part in the long-continued deliberations which resulted in 1894 in the enactment of the Wilson-Gorman law has been generally recognized. But he had scarcely less share in the enactment of the interstate-commerce law of 1887, the pioneer legislation on a subject that has recently enjoyed so large a share of the attention of the Government.

Senator Gorman has frequently been represented as the opposite to the idealist, as a man intensely materialistic, and given to considerations of expediency rather than of fidelity to abstract principles. I have in mind many illustrations to show that this is a complete misconception of his character. an intensely practical man, and believed that legislation is a practical business. His disposition was to get what he could, and, when he could not get what he thought he ought to have, His disposition was to get what he could, he compromised and got all he could. But he would not compromise a principle. I have in mind as an illustration of this phase of his character and habit what occurred comparatively recently in regard to the Panama Canal. Senator GORMAN realized as vividly as anybody could realize what the commercial interest of the South was in having an interoceanic canal, but he did not approve the method whereby the Panama route was adopted and finally secured. I hope it is not against the proprieties of this occasion for me to say that I do not believe any Democrat will blame Senator Gorman for taking his stand in defense of the old principles of the Democratic party as against yielding to what seemed a commercial advantage to the Southern States. I have always honored him for his attitude at this juncture, and I believe that a very large measure of praise will ultimately be given to him when the history of this proposition comes to be written.

It is true, Mr. Speaker, that this great man, like all other men of force in affairs long prominent in the public eye, in intimate association with great events in the history of their country, encountered much and bitter criticism. He did not, indeed, object to criticism, honest criticism. He welcomed it. No public man shrinks from honest criticism. He must be always ready to render an account to his fellow-citizens and to the judgment of posterity for his acts, and he must expect that his character and his deeds will pass under the scrutiny of men who do not agree with him and who will willingly find nothing to comment on to his advantage.

But, sir, it is, to my mind, a most sorrowful thing that another kind of criticism spent its fury upon the head of the uncomplaining Senator from Maryland in the last hours of his life. The snarls and cries of ghouls and jackalls mingled with the sounds of the clods that fell upon his coffin. The function of the muck-raker, Mr. Speaker, is, properly speaking, not one of criticism at all. It is frankly one of pessimism, of spite, of hatred, of elemental, savage, indiscriminate cruelty.

Nothing could better illustrate the extent to which the public judgment may be temporarily demoralized than that the opinions of so many earnest and honest men should be swayed by the mercenary rhetoric of certain brilliant but perverted minds in the service of splenetic disappointment, groveling jealousy, and vengeful degeneracy, displayed in assaults upon the characters of public men, wherein a devilish artifice seeks by one grain of truth to give color to a whole ocean of inference and allegation. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the time is at hand when we may hope to derive some public good from this Nearly every wrong bears in it the seeds of its own correction. I believe the pendulum is about to swing the other way. I believe the people of the United States are losing patience with this tendency gratuitously to impute to public men the very worst motives of which their conduct is susceptible as the result of the most ingenious misconstruction, and to picture practically every Member of both bodies of the American Congress as the secret, willing, and corrupted tool of interests opposed to the public welfare. As I leave public life myself, sir, am glad to welcome for those who remain a better condition of public sentiment in this respect.

I do not know, Mr. Speaker, what the opinions of Senator Gorman were touching the great issues of the hereafter. I do know, I think, that whatever they were they were sincerely and fearlessly entertained, and that, as was the case with every other problem that I ever knew to present itself to his mind, he had adjusted himself to a solution that was satisfactory to himself. For myself I believe as devoutly as it is possible for me to believe anything that the soul of the great Senator from Maryland, untrammeled by the necessities and the influences of its temple of mortality, is to-day free, somewhere in this great universe, to proceed upon its unimpeded pathway of illimitable development. I can not look upon the history of things as we see them recorded in geology, in the science of anthropology, and in the development of human institutions without being convinced profoundly, sir, that all that religion reveals and all that science ascertains are absolutely in harmony in the demonstration of this great probability (for, in the nature of things, until some traveler comes back from that bourne whence none has ever yet returned we can not have absolute knowledge) that, whereas the earlier reaches of time were devoted to the evolution of the human body; and whereas, next in importance, the human mind absorbed the energies of evolutionary force; and whereas, finally, the human soul, the third and crowning consummation in the long process of evolutional progress; and whereas conditions here on earth for so little a time are so adverse to the development and perfection of those high capacities, it is a reasonable, if not a necessary, conclusion, to which science as well as religion points, that there must be reserved, in the stretches of time succeeding this mortal existence, an opportunity for the perfection of that highest achievement of the processes of creation, the human soul.

And so to-day, as I pay my tribute of love and reverence to the memory of my great and departed friend, it is not as one who sorrows utterly, but as one who looks forward with a faith that is absolute to the time when he and all of us, beyond the trials and tribulations of mere mortality, shall be still employed in working out the ultimate purposes of that Divine Intelligence that created everything.

that created everything.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. Speaker, more than half a century ago there might have been seen a bright-eyed, promising youth darting through the halls of this Capitol, doing the errands of a page. This boy was ARTHUR PUE GORMAN.

Born of a splendid Scotch-Irish parentage almost under the shadow of this historic building, and having come in personal contact with nearly all the great political leaders from Henry Clay to those who now move about us, and having been blessed by nature with a strong, incisive intellect and a winning personality, and having acquired reasonable educational advantages, how could be have become less great?

He spent his boyhood days in the atmosphere of eloquence and statesmanship; the thundering eloquence of Webster expounding the Constitution and the scathing logic of the gifted Calhoun, defending States rights, was still ringing in the ears of those who moved about him in his earliest boyhood days.

At the age of 14 he was appointed a page in the United States The venerable Clay was still there. Sumner and Seward were just rising in their transcendent intellectual glory. Judah P. Benjamin, William L. Yancey, and Robert Toombs were among his daily preceptors. Stephen A. Douglas, the little giant of the West, was his personal friend and great benefactor. Doubtless from this fiery, brilliant Democrat young Gorman acquired many of his successful traits of political character. In his maturer years he was the companion and compatriot of Lamar, Benjamin H. Hill, Randall, Conkling, Blaine, and Gar-field, the sublimest aggregation of forensic intellectuality ever produced by any age or country. These great national characters were the associates of the late Senator Gorman from his boyhood days to the period when he reached the vigor of full manhood, and he seemed to have imbibed their successful traits of character without embracing their follies. In the course of time he became a parliamentary leader superior to either of If Robert E. Lee was the greatest military leader of the South, it can likewise be said that the late Senator Gorman was her greatest parliamentarian and political leader. He had the power of leading his party to victory even in the face of almost certain defeat. He never surrendered, however impending the danger or however meager the chances of success

His career scintillates with success at every turning point—always being equal to any emergency. His life was a continuous scene of successful progression from boyhood up. After serving as a page in the Senate he was made postmaster of that body; then internal-revenue collector for the Fifth district of Maryland; then a member and speaker of the Maryland house of delegates; then in 1880, at the age of 41, he entered the greatest forum in the world, the United States Senate. In that body he soon rose to the leadership of his party, and after three successive terms he was succeeded in the Senate by another, though in 1903, at the very next turn of the political wheel, in his native State, he was returned to the Senate and, by the unanimous consent of his Democratic colleagues, was restored to the leadership of his party—a tribute won by his merit and conferred in a spirit of chivalry.

Mr. Speaker, many, many years will come and go ere the South will cease to revere the memory of this great man. In 1891, when this House, under the leadership of the iron and irrepressible Reed, passed and sent to the Senate the Federal election bill—commonly known as the "force bill"—the lest election bill—commonly known as the "force bill"—the last attempted infamy of reconstruction, the bravest of our Southern statesman despaired before the impending doom. In that fair section business was paralyzed; the throb of industry was bushed; the plowshare was left standing in the unbroken fields, and the spectral horrors of reconstruction again haunted every

sorbed the energies of evolutionary force; and whereas, finally, in the growth of altruism, and in the realization of the brother-hood of man, there began to expand the limitless possibilities of African misrule. It seemed as though the last remaining vestige of States rights and civil liberty surviving the late civil war was about to be extinguished. At its crisis the South appealed to the fair and the just of every section. Many southern leaders seemed helpless and hopeless in the face of the overwhelming partisan opposition in the Senate. Not so with Senator Gorman. He had an intuitive conviction of the justice of the cause and was sustained by an unfaltering moral courage, the indispensable virtue in every successful leader. He was bold, yet prudent; active, yet patient; unyielding, yet conservative, watchful, and above all things, as brave as the bravest. Unlike some other leaders he took but little part in the great debate. He acted while others talked. In this respect he more nearly approximated Parnell, the great Irish patriot and leader, than any other modern statesman. Like all great leaders, Parnell summoned to his aid his greatest lieutenants to do his talking while he acted and worked. In this regard Senator Gorman might in-deed truly have been called the Moses of the Senate, while his colleagues were its Aarchs.

When the forensic battle over the force bill was raging in the Senate and when the high tide of partisan denunciation had been reached, he was not disturbed, but remained cool, deliberate, and calculating. In the wild scenes of that august body it appeared that in him "Reason held the helm, while passion blew the gale." Like his great military prototype. Stonewall blew the gale." Like his great military prototype, Stonewall Jackson, who often in the midst of the wild carnage of battle would silently and quietly search about the ranks of the enemy for a more vulnerable point of assault, so Senator Gorman, in the midst of the fray, reconnoitered the enemy's position, observing a weak point here and the stronghold there, and never failed to take prompt advantage of every position assailable. His superb parliamentary tactics and leadership thwarted all the well-laid plans of the Senate majority, and when the smoke of battle had cleared away the victory was his; the force bill was relegated to oblivion and the country

Mr. Speaker, in the same grave where slumbers this attempted political usurpation is buried sectional hatred. The gulf of malice that so long existed between the North and South has closed forever. The sections are united in all the ties that inspire national greatness; the people have learned to know each other better and to love each other more. Now we have a great common country, a homogeneous people with kindred hopes and united aspirations. We are like the ancient States of Greece, each Commonwealth a kingdom unto itself, yet contending each with the other in sacrifices for the good of the common country.

The death of the force bill was the birth of southern pros-England's greatest historian tells us that in five years after the wars of Cromwell, that involved every English family and every foot of her soil, the people were restored to their normal prosperity, but it was forty years after the termination of the late civil war before the South could realize a throbbing pulse of increasing prosperity. That which the ravages of war left was prostrated and paralyzed by the infamy of reconstruction, but these gloomy days have passed and the South is now on the high road to prosperity. Upon the death of the force bill commenced an increasing wave of industrial development and onward it has rolled until the wealth and industrial effort of that long-paralyzed section have many times multi-plied. The energies, the aspirations of a great people long stupified by the cruel apprehensions of African misrule have been diverted into channels of industrial endeavor. Home rule and local self-government have been vouchsafed to the people of that section; northern capital, like the rivers into the sea, has been flowing into that section from every quarter of the Union. Many noble and good people of the North and West are seeking homes in the sunny South, and they are always re-ceived with welcome and soon become thoroughly assimilated to our social and political conditions.

The throb of the engine, the whir of the spindle, the ring of the hammer may now be heard in every hamlet of the South; and the bursting granary, the contented negro in the snow-white cotton fields, the screaming locomotive, the romping children, the lullaby of the "housewife plying her evening care," all bespeak peace and industrial contentment. Too, they proclaim a eulogium of the deeds and virtues of the great departed Senator more eloquent than human tongue can utter. He has erected a monument in the hearts of millions that will chant his praises along the corridors of time. The monumental shaft, so high as to pierce the thunder's home and more lasting than brass, does not endure like the inscription of gratitude upon the tablet of the human heart. The heroism of Leonidas is still fresh and green in the memory of the liberty-loving world, while the scorpion has long been hiding in the ruins of monumental Greece. Emmet's martyrdom to liberty, though without a stone carved to his memory, will be remembered as long as Erin's blood flows in mortal veins. So the memory of this great tribune of the people will not vanish with passing years. Coming generations will do him honor and hold up his superb life as worthy of emulation by their aspiring sons.

But the defeat of the force bill was not the only public service rendered by Senator Gorman worthy of consideration. It will be remembered that when the Paris treaty, by which we acquired the Philippines, was sent to the Senate, he, as the leader of the minority in that body, at once marshaled his forces to defeat its ratification, and many believe that he would have succeeded but for the intermeddling and intervention of others high in the counsels of the Democratic party. He be-lieved that the imperialistic policy of the party in power was in contravention of the spirit and the letter of the Constitution, and that it would ultimately breed disastrous consequences. How ominously prophetic was his wisdom when viewed in the light of the fact that this colonial pet has cost the Government $700,000,000 and the lives of thousands of brave and gallant soldiers. This great sacrifice has been made without any benefit whatever to our Government. The blood of the gallant Lawton cries out in condemnation of this infamous policy. At this very hour every wind that blows from the Pacific brings forebodings of war with Japan, and should it come, the wisdom of the great Senator will be doubly verified. In the future may we profit by his wisdom, and at the very first opportunity pass this bitter cup to more congenial lips.

Like all truly great men, Senator Gorman did not exhaust all his virtues in the public arena, but his character was sublime in private life. In his domestic relations he was loving, true, gentle, and kind. He loved his home, his was foring, true, gentie, and kind. He loved his home, his people, and his God. He was charitable to the poor and without envy of the rich. The ragged newsboy and the hard-pressed laborer could always reach his manly heart. His generous charity and kind words waked "to ecstasy" the slumbering ambition of many a forlorn youth. Not until the scrolls of eternity are unfolded will the full measure of his benedic-tions to humanity be realized.

But his manly voice is silent. The eagle that long soared about the mountain's peak has been stricken to earth. Death, the antithesis of life, the avenger of all, the respecter of none, the grim messenger from—we know not where—with icy finger touched his heart and bade it be still. His majestic life, studded with the golden gems of love, charity, and patriotism, pro-claims that he went to his grave with an unfaltering trust in the promise of the new life flashed from Calvary's brow. He is not dead, but has simply passed the gateway of death from the scenes of his usefulness to the realms of his God.

There is no Death! what seems so is transition;
This life of mortal breath
Is but a suburb of the life Elysian,
Whose portal we call Death.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Speaker, having known the late Senator ABTHUB PUE GORMAN for many years, and as my forefathers for more than two centuries claimed Maryland as their home, I feel it a duty to add a few words to the memory of one of the leading sons of that grand old Commonwealth.

The soil of that State is sacred to me, as it holds the dust of seven generations of my family and some day will be my own last peaceful resting place.

Proud as I am of the achievements of the long line of illustrious men of the State, I should feel recreant to duty and false to the name and character of my ancestors if I did not say something on this occasion.

Senator Gorman was a worthy son of whom all the people of Maryland are justly proud. He left his impress for good, not alone on his native State, but upon the nation as well.

As is usual with great men in all ages, he was frequently mis-understood and his motives misconstrued. Those who knew him best loved him for his sterling character, for his warm generous heart, his kind, loving disposition, his splendid family relations, as well as for his firm and unswerving loyalty to duty. In all walks of life, even by his political foes, he was respected His character, both private and public, was above and admired. suspicion, and his patriotism of that high order that should characterize every true American citizen.

As has been so ably and eloquently said by the many distinguished speakers who have preceded me, he was one of nature's noblemen, a man of whom the entire country may well feel a just and honorable pride; one whose memory will ever fondly be cherished. The people of the nation claim him as one of America's great men, and his life and work belong to them as well as to the State of Maryland.

We honor ourselves and the patriotic people of the country by meeting here to-day to show our respect, love, and admiration for the life and achievements of our departed friend Senator

ARTHUR PUE GORMAN. The magnificent tribute paid his memory by the Speaker of this House to-day was from one who knew him well.

The sentiments found a warm response in the hearts of all who had the honor of hearing his beautiful words to the memory As an humble friend and warm admirer of of Senator GORMAN. this leading son of Maryland, I place this simple wreath to his memory.

Mr. GILL. Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks on this solemn occasion, I must frankly confess that I have always en-tertained a dislike for memorial proceedings of this character, and for that reason have always heretofore declined to participate in them. But I have been so deeply impressed by the eulogies on the late Senator from Maryland, so feelingly and impressively pronounced in the Senate yesterday, that my prejudices on this subject have been very much modified, if not altogether dissipated. The solemn proceedings in the Senate yesterday have convinced me that it is not only fitting, but essential to the formation of a just estimate of the public achievements of a man like Senator Gorman that those who were most intimately associated with him in the work to which he devoted the best years of his life should be given an opportunity of testifying to his worth as a man and as a public

My own acquaintance with the deceased Senator dates back to the time when he served his first term in the State senate of Maryland, I then being a member of the Maryland house of delegates. As he and I served on the joint committee made up of the finance committee of the senate and the ways and means committee of the house of delegates, I was afforded an excellent opportunity of learning something of the man. I was not long in discovering that even at that time he was a man of force, ability, and character.

His industry was proverbial. No detail in connection with his work was too trivial for consideration. Once having mastered the details of a proposition he was prepared to grapple with all the difficulties that presented themselves on the subject. His knowledge of human nature and his ability to gauge those who were associated with him were marvelous. He was seldom unsuccessful in his efforts to convince his associates of the wisdom of the particular policy which he thought it well to pursue in order to bring about the enactment of such legislation as he deemed wise. The qualities which he displayed at that early period of his legislative career foreshadowed the success which in later years crowned his efforts. The rise from the position of State senator to that of United States Senator was to him a comparatively easy task. Only a short span of years intervened between his promotion to the Senate and his assumption of the leadership of the minority in that body, and with the duties of this dignified and responsible office he coupled those of leader of the national Democracy

The achievements of the late Senator Gorman as a member of the United States Senate have been forcefully and so eloquently portrayed in the Senate Chamber yesterday, by Republicans as well as Democrats, that it would be futile for any one else to add anything to the eulogies which appear in the Con-GRESSIONAL RECORD of to-day. That his services in the Senate GRESSIONAL RECORD of to-day. That his services in the Senate had been appreciated by the great mass of the people of the State which I have the honor in part to represent in this body is demonstrated by an incident which occurred during my campaign last fall. While addressing the largest meeting held in my district, at which there were about 4,000 people present, I referred to the force bill and to the masterly qualities of leadership which Senator Gorman displayed on that occasion, and which resulted in the defeat of that measure. At the mention of the late Senator's name there was a greater outburst of spontaneous and persistent applause than I ever heard elicited by the mention of the name of any of our distinguished citizens on similar occasions.

The conspicuous service rendered by the late Senator Gor-MAN in bringing about the defeat of the force bill carned for him more than the gratitude of his own State. This achievement endeared him more than any other patriotic act in his life to all the people of the South and to millions of the North who believed that the force bill was fraught with the greatest danger to the liberties of our people.

That a prophet is not without honor save in his own home is an axiom the truth of which probably no other man in public life had more reason to feel than the late Senator from Maryland. His rapid attainment of the highest honor which his State could confer upon him, while drawing to him hosts of loyal and faithful friends, who were true to him to the last, also created many enemies who leveled at him the sharpest shafts of satire and denunciation, yet all must admit that notwithstanding the obstacles that beset his path and the constant strife that waged about him he remained in the conflict to the last, only laying aside his armor and sword for the garb in which one is arrayed who starts on the journey from whence there is no return.

The future biographer and the future historian will give to ARTHUR P. GORMAN the niche in the Temple of Fame to which his public services justly entitle him.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the Record the resolutions which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to have incorporated in the Record the resolutions which will now be reported by the Clerk.

Senate joint memorial No. 2.

Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America:

Schate and House of Representatives of the United States of America:

Your memorialists, the senate and house of representatives of the State of Oregon, respectfully represent:

That in order to handle the wheat crop, the wool clip, and the hop products of the Pacific Northwest it is necessary to use large quantities of burlap made from jute fiber, and that at the present time it requires not less than 20,000,000 jute bags to handle the wheat crop of the Pacific Northwest, and that large quantities of jute cloth are used for sacking of wool and baling hops as well; and

Whereas within one year the price of jute and jute fabric has increased at least 50 per cent, probably owing to a jute trust or the increasing demand for jute; and

Whereas owing to this increase in the price of jute, jute cloth, and jute fabric, it has worked very much of a detriment to the farmers, wool growers, and the agriculturalists in general: Therefore your memorialists respectfully request your honorable bodies to remove all tariffs now in existence on raw jute, jute fabric, and jute bags imported into the United States and admit free of duty all such material. Be it

Resolved, That the secretary of state is hereby instructed to transmit a copy of this resolution to the Hon. C. W. Fillow, United States Senator from Oregon, and respectfully request them, as members of Congress, to use all honorable means to have such duty removed.

Adopted by the senate January 22, 1907.

APPEALS IN CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15434) to regulate appeals in criminal prose-

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That a writ of error may be taken by and on behalf of the United States from the district or circuit courts to the Supreme Court or the circuit courts of appeals, as prescribed in an act entitled "An act to establish circuit courts of appeals and to define and regulate in certain cases the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1891, and the acts amendatory thereof, in all criminal cases, in the following instances, to wit:

From the decision or judgment quashing or setting aside an indictment:

ment;
From the decision or judgment sustaining a demurrer to an indictment or any count thereof;
From the decision arresting a judgment of conviction for insufficiency of the indictment;
From the decision or judgment sustaining a special plea in bar, when the defendant has not been put in jeopardy.
In all these instances the United States shall be entitled to a bill of exceptions as in civil cases.
That hereafter all objections to the sufficiency of the indictment in matters of form only shall be made and determined prior to the inpancing of the jury.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HALE. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. NELSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. President, this is an important measure. Mr. CLAY. did not catch its full import in the reading. I dislike to take the time of the Senate, but I ask that it be again read. The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment reported as a substitute from the Committee on the Judiciary will be again read.

The Secretary again read the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary in the nature of a substitute.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. HALE. I do not expect, Mr. President, to be able to arrest the progress of this bill, but I desire an opportunity to vote against it, and to protest against it.

I do not think there is any necessity for changing the great fundamental principle of law of protecting the citizen that has always obtained for English-speaking people and to add now anything more to the rights and privileges of the General Gov-The old criminal law, with its method of administration and the proposition that no man shall be put in peril twice, is good enough criminal law for me. The tendency of the present day is to take away from the citizen and to give to the Government. I deprecate that tendency. I am in a minority, and can only protest. I shall ask, when the final vote is taken, that we may have the yeas and nays upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, I concur entirely with the Sen-I do not think this bill ought to pass, and ator from Maine. least of all that it should be taken up by unanimous consent and hurried through. It is a bill taking from a party charged with crime privileges which he now enjoys and which have never been taken from him before in the history of the criminal practice of the United States courts.

I shall certainly vote against the bill if it is put to a vote of the Senate.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I do not intend to enter into any debate, but I desire to correct the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Maryland in the misapprehension under which both seem to labor.

The bill does not in any shape take away any of the rights the defendant now has in the matter of appeal or review of criminal cases. It simply allows the Government, in certain cases, to take an appeal where the Government has never had that right before.

It has lately become the fashion in several of the United States inferior courts for judges to pronounce an act of Congress unconstitutional and void. Where an indictment has been framed, after the court has made that decision and decided the act unconstitutional and void, there is no way by which the case can be appealed to the Supreme Court for a decision

In addition, I wish to say that this is no innovation. If the Senator from Maryland will consult the statutes of his own State he will find that in certain cases there the State is allowed an appeal in criminal cases even broader than this bill proposes to give.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a ques-

Mr. NELSON. In a moment. If Senators will examine the reports of the committee they will find that in a large ma-jority of the States provision has been made in one form or another for an appeal in criminal cases.

The substance of this bill has been recommended by the Department of Justice for several years. It was specially recommended by the President in his recent annual message. The bill as it came from the House has been entirely revised and amended by the committee. In a late number of the Harvard Law Review, one of the best legal periodicals I know of in the country, the House bill and the Senate committee substitute are discussed, and they entirely agree that this is a just and proper measure; that it is entirely within constitutional limits, and that it in no wise detracts from the rights the defendant has heretofore had. It simply authorizes in a certain few instances the Government to take an appeal for the purpose of getting an adjudication upon important constitutional questions

Mr. HALE. The Government has not that appeal now?

Mr. NELSON. No; it has not. The Government has no right of appeal in criminal cases,

Mr. HALE. That is it precisely. This is a very great innovation.

Mr. NELSON. I wish to say further that where a jury has been impaneled and where the defendant has been tried an appeal does not lie. It is only in proceedings ancillary to the impaneling of a jury.

Mr. HALE. I understand that; and if the Senator will allow

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.
Mr. HALE. I understand that clearly. I read the bill very carefully. It came up once before and I objected to it. It does not take away every right that the accused has, but it takes away certain rights that he has now, and allows an appeal by the Government as in civil cases, which it does not have now. But whether that is right or wrong, that there will be no appeal by the Government has been one of the principles of law which has been practiced and observed for years. That is how it is an innovation.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not desire to discuss the measure at length. There are other Senators here who are on the Judiciary Committee and who will probably present the legal view of it, one of them, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], especially, having had experience in the class of cases out of which the demand for this law grew.

I simply desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact, which has been previously stated by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. Nelson], that this measure in no manner prejudices the rights of the defendant. It in no manner puts him twice in jeopardy.

The principle of the rule that a man shall not be put twice in jeopardy is based upon a very sound reasoning. In a criminal case on one side there is the powerful Government, whether that be the Federal Government or a State government, and on the other side there is the individual accused. If it were within the power of the Government to put a man in jeopardy more than once, it will be seen that the power for tyranny and oppression When a man had once been tried and acwould be unlimited. quitted it would be known where the weak spot in the case of the prosecution was, and he could again be put upon trial and, either fraudulently or otherwise, the testimony necessary to buttress the case in that particular could be supplied and the man again put upon trial, and if that effort failed the same process could be gone through without limitation, and the opportunity for tyranny and oppression and wrong and injustice would be absolutely unlimited.

Therefore it is a sound principle, one based upon the highest considerations of justice and humanity, that a man shall not be put in jeopardy more than once. In other words, whenever a case has proceeded to the point where the machinery has been put in operation which at its conclusion would result either in a conviction or an acquittal the proceeding must go to its conclusion, and that conclusion must be final, and if before reaching the ordinary stage of finality the case breaks down the defendant goes free. That is the soundest of principles, one recognized universally in all of the countries at least drawing their legal institutions from the same source that we do.

Now, Mr. President, what this bill seeks is in no manner to contravene that great fundamental principle, one which should be forever inviolate, and one which no member of the Judiciary Committee, I am sure, and no member of the Senate would for erroneous decision by a judge may be corrected without in any manner infringing upon the rights of the defendant. If any lawyer here will examine the bill and analyze it he will see that the committee, after the most careful and long-continued and painstaking investigation, has limited the action of the bill to a review by the court purely of a legal question, without in any manner affecting the rights of the man whose case gave rise to that question.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President-

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BACON. I do.
Mr. MALLORY. In reference to the point the Senator is on, I should like to call his attention to the provision regarding overruling or sustaining a special plea in bar in the following language:

From the decision or judgment sustaining a special plea in bar when the defendant has not been put in jeopardy.

I am asking merely for information, not with any inten-

Mr. BACON. That language was inserted in the bill just out of abundance of caution.

Mr. MALLORY. I should like to inquire of the Senator if a party has been arraigned and filed a plea he is not in jeopardy, having been put in jeopardy by the very fact and he has been arraigned and required to plea? If that is so, then I do not see why this provision is inserted at all.

Mr. BACON. There may be cases in which that is true. may be generally the case that it is true. If so, there is no prejudice to the prisoner, because it is expressly limited to a case where he has not been put in jeopardy. Therefore, unless there arose a case where there has been a decision upon a plea where he has not been in jeopardy this bill would not apply. That clause is only put in the bill, as I said, out of abundance of caution—caution on the two sides. In the first place, if there has been a decision of such a plea relating to a matter of law where the party has not been put in jeopardy, there ought to be an opportunity to have that question decided by the ultimate court. On the other hand, if it is a plea where he has been put in jeopardy, the desire to have that question decided shall not prevail, and the man must go free.

So it does seem to me the language of the proposed law, whether the suggestion of the Senator is correct or not that in all cases he is put in jeopardy, absolutely relieves the case from any possibility of injury to the defendant.

Mr. HALE. At any rate, if the Senator will allow me—
The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia vield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. HALE. At any rate, the accused, the single man, the one man who is brought before the court upon a solemn indictment, if there has been just such a ruling as the Senator wants an appeal taken from, and the accused has been discharged, that heretofore has been the end of it, has it not?

Mr. BACON. Yes. Mr. HALE. Now, the Senator does not want that to be the end of it?

Mr. BACON. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. HALE. He wants the Government to come in.
Mr. BACON. I said "yes" too quickly, I think. Not necessarily so. If there was a demurrer to an indictment and it was sustained, it is not necessarily an end to it, because there could be a new indictment found; but at the same time, in the finding of a new indictment there would be no opportunity to have the Supreme Court pass upon the question of law which was involved in it.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Georgia is giving a very good argument against the necessity for this. The Government may have a new indictment now.

Mr. BACON. Yes.

But to say-and the Senator from Florida [Mr. Mr. HALE. Mallory] had brought that point out very clearly-that a citizen, one person, is not put in jeopardy when he has been solemnly indicted and haled before a court—

Mr. BACON. Oh, no; the Senator is wrong about that. That is not what the law means by being put in jeopardy. It has an entirely different meaning.

Mr. HALE. If a proceeding takes place under that and he is discharged, heretofore that has been the end of it.

Mr. BACON. No; the Senator is mistaken as to both. It is not necessarily the end of it. He is not put in jeopardy. That is not what the law means by being put in jeopardy at all. The words "being in jeopardy" are entirely a technical phrase, which does not relate to the fact that a man is in danger as a moment desire in the least to infringe upon.

The sole purpose of this bill is to enact a law by which an soon as an indictment is preferred against him.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator tell the Senate if this does not give some additional power to the Government as against the accused?

Mr. BACON. No: in no manner whatsoever.

Mr. HALE. Then, wherein lies the necessity for it?
Mr. BACON. I will endeavor to state to the Senator. That is certainly a very pertinent question. If there is no necessity for the bill, then it is a useless bill. That has been already stated by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. Nelson], and I will endeavor to restate, probably not so clearly, however, as he has

In the case where a man is indicted, and he is brought before the court and a demurrer is interposed before he is arraigned, upon the ground that the law under which he is charged with the commission of crime was unconstitutional, utterly null, and void, the judge sustains that demurrer and discharges the prisoner. Now, if that affected only that one prisoner, it would be a matter of comparatively slight importance; but it not only affects that prisoner, not only affects the accused in that particular case, but it affects all other persons who may assume to violate the same law; and a law of Congress is set aside, made absolutely null and void and inoperative by the decision of one judge, without the opportunity for the nine judges who sit in the Supreme Court to pass upon the great question whether or not-

Mr. HALE rose.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me a moment—whether or not the law solemnly enacted by Congress is or is not constitutional, affecting not simply that accused, affecting not simply all others who may be accused, but affecting the operation of the law of the land, and affecting all interests which are to be affected by that law, and utterly destroying all the protection which that law seeks to throw over the persons, the property, and the transactions of all citizens of the United States.

Mr. HALE. But has not that always been the case heretofore?

Mr. BACON. Certainly. It is one of the evils which have grown up, and for that reason, and for the correction of such evils solely, without contravening the fundamental principle to which I alluded in the beginning, the necessity has grown upthe great importance, I will say, because the Senator might not recognize the propriety of the word "necessity"—the great importance has grown that the question of the constitutionality of a law shall not be limited to the decision of one judge, and he possibly the most inferior in rank of all the judges, but that it may go to this great court.

The Senator will perceive that there is no way to get a question to this court because, as the law now stands, when the inferior judge determines the law to be unconstitutional, the matter is ended. The sole purpose of this is, and the sole effect of it will be, to enable the highest court in the land to pass upon a naked law question in a manner that shall in no wise affect the rights or interests of the party against whom the accusation has been made and he in no manner be put twice in jeopardy.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President—
Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will pardon me a moment, because it is impossible to present this subject without doing so with some degree of continuity. I do not want the Senator to misunderstand me in that; but I want to read to the Senator what the law means when it speaks of being placed in jeopardy. I am indebted to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. Knox], who very kindly turned to the law dictionary and has put in my hands this definition:

A person once placed upon his trial before a competent court and jury, charged with his case upon a valid indictment, is in jeopardy, in the sense of the Constitution, unless such jury be discharged without rendering a verdict, from a legal necessity, or from cause beyond the control of the court, such as death, sickness, or insanity of some one of the jury, the prisoner, or the court, or by consent of the prisoner. (People v. Webb, 38 Cal., 467.)

When a person is placed on trial upon a valid indictment, before a competent court and jury, he is put in jeopardy; and the discharge of the jury without verdict, unless by consent of the defendant, or from some unavoidable accident or necessity, is equivalent to an acquittal. Among these unavoidable necessities are the inability of the jury to agree after a reasonable time for deliberation; also the close of the term of the court. (Exp. McLaughlin, 41 Cal., 211; People v. Cage, 48 ib., 324.)

of the court. (Exp. McLaughlin, 41 Cal., 211, People 8. Cag., 324.)

If a person is indicted for manslaughter, and, on his trial, the court, without the consent of the defendant, discharges the jury upon the ground that the evidence shows that the defendant is gullty of murder, the defendant has been put in jeopardy. He can not be again indicted for murder for the same killing, but is entitled to an acquittal. (People v. Hunckeler, 48 Cal., 331.)

Whenever a person has been given in charge, on a legal indictment, to a regular jury, and that jury is unnecessarily discharged, he has been once put in jeopardy, and the discharge is equivalent to a verdict of acquittal. (Wright v. State, 5 Ind., 290; McCorkle v. State, 14 ib., 39; s. p. Helkes v. Commonwealth, 26 Pa. St., 513; United States v. Shoemaker, 2 McLean, 114.)

Where a valid indictment has been returned by a competent grand jury to a court having jurisdiction, the defendant has been arraigned and pleaded, a jury impancied, sworn, and charged with the case, and all the preliminary things of record are ready for the trial, the jeopardy has attached.

Mr. SPOONER. From what is the Senator reading?
Mr. BACON. I am reading a definition from Abbott's Law Dictionary, page 650. These are quotations from the decisions of the courts, which I am upon now, which have been cited by the author as illustrations of the cases in which there has been

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator read that last statement again in regard to the proceedings in court-

Mr. BACON. I will reread it. Mr. HALE. Which shows what has taken place; and when, if it has taken place, the feature of jeopardy attaches?

Mr. BACON. I think it does, Mr. HALE. Will the Senator please read that again? Mr. BACON. I will read it again; but it is directly in the line of what I said before I began the reading. This definition of what constitutes being put in jeopardy—that is to say, even if the case broke down before reaching the ordinary stage of finality the right which arose out of "having once been put in jeopardy" attaches and the prisoner goes free. I will read that again, because it is very material, as it evidently struck the mind of the Senator from Maine. I will begin again, as I was interrupted in the middle of it:

Where a valid indictment has been returned by a competent grand jury to a court having jurisdiction, the defendant has been arraigned and pleaded, a jury been impaneled, sworn, and charged with the case, and all the preliminary things of record are ready for the trial, the jeopardy has attached; and, unless the defendant waives his constitutional right, or unforeseen circumstances withdraw from him the benefit of the privilege, any subsequent lapse or error in the proceedings of the court will entitle him to be discharged from custody. (Morgan v. State, 13 Ind., 215.)

There is a very clear statement of the preliminary proceedings which, when proceeded with or gone into, will entitle the party to an acquittal and protect him against any future prosecution. But the particular feature to which I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Maine and other Senators who are unfavorable to the consideration or the passage of this bill is this: That with that clear statement made now of these preliminary proceedings, an examination of this bill will show that there is no question which in any manner relates to any of the particular proceedings enumerated and specified there which under this bill could be carried to the Supreme Court-in other words, every question which can be taken under this bill to the Supreme Court is a question which arose before any single one of the things mentioned in this very clear description of That is the case of Morgan v. The what constitutes jeopardy. State (13 Ind., p. 215).
Mr. RAYNER. I should like to ask the Senator whether there has every been any decision of the Supreme Court as to what constitutes "jeopardy" in a criminal case? I should like to know, if the Senator can answer.

Mr. BACON. I have not examined this particular question with reference to its being brought to the attention of the Senate upon authority, and therefore I am not prepared to answer the question at this time. I presume it is more than probable that the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. Knox] can answer specifically; but that does not leave the matter in doubt as to what constitutes jeopardy.

Mr. RAYNER. I know there is a vast conflict of decision in the States, and I should like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. Knox] whether he recalls any decision of the Supreme Court which defines the word " jeopardy?

Mr. KNOX. No; I do not.
Mr. RAYNER. Neither do I recall any at this time.
Mr. BACON. But, Mr. President, I am quite confident of one thing—absolutely confident—that there can be no decision found which will hold that either one of the particular things specified here as a decision from which there can be an appealno one of them has ever been specified by a court as having put a party in jeopardy.

Mr. RAYNER. I should like to ask the Senator, if he will allow me to do so-

Mr. BACON. Certainly; and the Senator need not ask permission.

Mr. RAYNER. I merely asked-

Mr. BACON. But the Senator asked it in a way as if he doubted whether or not I would grant it.

Mr. RAYNER. Oh, no; I did not doubt it at all; in fact, I would not have asked it if I had not known the Senator would grant it.

On line 15 and 16 the bill provides-

From the decision arresting a judgment of conviction for insufficiency of the indictment.

Can a man be put in jeopardy on a motion for an arrest of

Mr. BACON. Mr. President-Mr. NELSON. Will the Sen Will the Senator from Georgia yield to me

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BACON. I do. Mr. NELSON. I de I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] to the fact that the motion in arrest of judgment is made by the defendant. When he asks for that relief, he has waived his constitutional right, and it was so decided by the Supreme Court in the case of Ball v. The United States, 163 United States Reports. The defendant had moved an arrest of judgment and had the proceedings stayed. An appeal was taken to the Supreme Court, and the Supreme Court held that the motion was good because the indictment was bad, and the party could be reindicted and retried for that offense because it was done on his own request, on his own motion: otherwise he could not be.

Mr. RAYNER. I should like to know on what page that is. Mr. NELSON. I will give the Senator the case in a minute.

Mr. SPOONER. It is the Ball case.

Mr. NELSON. I will read the syllabus, with the permission of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. RAYNER. What is the case?

Mr. NELSON. The United States v. Ball, 163 United States Reports.

Mr. RAYNER. What pa Mr. NELSON. Page 662. What page?

Mr. RAYNER. I should like to have the Senator from Minnesota read it, with the permission of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. I think the Senator from Minnesota has properly answered it. The party is not protected, as the law now stands, against being tried again under the circumstances stated by the Senator.

Will the Senator from Georgia allow me to Mr. NELSON. read a part of the syllabus, and then I will not take up more of the Senator's time?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.
Mr. NELSON. I now read from the syllabus:

A defendant in a criminal case, who procures a verdict and judgment against him to be set aside by the court, may be tried anew upon the same or another indictment for the same offense of which he was

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not desire to occupy the attention of the Senate in any more protracted discussion of this question, because, as I stated in the beginning, I rather expected the argument to be made by other Senators. I had really but one object in addressing the Senate on this subject, and that was to call the attention of the Senate to the great principle involved in the rule, so well honored and which no one would desire in any manner to infringe upon, that a man shall not be twice put in jeopardy, and to emphasize as strongly as I could my own attitude that under no circumstances would I support any bill which put a man twice in jeopardy; under no circumstances would I take away from any defendant, as I understand the law, any right he now has. I do not consider this bill in any particular to take away from any defendant any right that he now enjoys or that it removes from him any single protection that our very humanitarian system of law has thrown around the accused. I would have him still under every particle of protection of the law which the present provisions of the law give to him, and under no circumstances would I consent to take away from him a single one of those rights.

But I do consider it to be of the very highest importance, not only as a particular question which may affect a particular class of offenders, but as a general principle, that wherever there is a decision saying that an act of Congress is unconstitutional, that question shall not be determined finally by the most inferior in rank of judges, but that it shall come ultimately to the highest court provided especially for the determination of such great fundamental questions.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President-

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. BACON. I yield with pleasure to the Senator. I will yield the floor, unless the Senator wishes to ask me a question.

I do not wish to ask a question. I simply wish to say, Mr. President, as in the beginning, I do not propose to discuss this matter, and I do not expect to arrest the passage of the bill, notwithstanding all that has been said that I do not like this departure. I do not like this feature of giving what the Government has never had, an appeal in criminal cases at ministration of the law, under the rule that has obtained always with English-speaking peoples. Without any more time, I simply say that I desire an opportunity to vote against the bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, for the last few years Congress has been pressing its own powers and Federal jurisdiction over fields heretofore occupied by the jusisdiction of the States, upon the ground, mainly, that the Congress was in advance of the States in all legislation and that our changing conditions required such action. The rule seems to have been reversed in this particular instance, because in the field of criminal jurisprudence the States themselves seem to have taken the advance, and for many years we have had appeals by the States in criminal prosecutions in matters of sustaining demurrers and in matters of orders sustaining motions in arrest of judgment, wherever the motion was based on constitutional grounds.

Mr. President, there are many good reasons for this. It is not putting the defendant in jeopardy twice. Take the case of a demurrer. The defendant is not in jeopardy until a trial has begun before a jury and upon a proper indictment. He will not be put in jeopardy in the case of an arrest of judgment, if this bill becomes a law, for after a jury has found the de-fendant guilty, the case will be continued if a motion in arrest of judgment is sustained until that motion can be heard.

Mr. President, there is another reason for the enactment of

Mr. RAYNER rose.

Mr. McCUMBER. I just want to express this opinion, and then I will yield: As it is under the present system a defendant in the State of Illinois may be found guilty, but upon a motion in arrest of judgment on constitutional grounds he is discharged. In the State of Iowa another defendant may be convicted and a motion in arrest of judgment upon the same constitutional grounds overruled. Therefore we have a conviction in one State and an acquittal in another State for exexactly the same kind of an offense and upon purely a legal technicality-that is, as to whether or not the law is constitutional.

Mr. President, the defendant ought not always to be compelled to take the appeal. If an appeal had been allowed in a case of that kind upon the judgment of the court in the State of Illinois, probably before the defendant would have been tried in the State of Iowa the Supreme Court would have determined whether the law was constitutional, and therefore would not compel the defendant in the State of Iowa to go to the expense of taking this appeal. Certainly I can not understand how a person is put twice in jeopardy under any of the provisions of this bill, and I never could understand why the State should not be allowed to take an appeal from a judgment of an inferior court on the question of the sufficiency of an indictment, especially when the question is a constitutional ques-

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, under our Constitution any person accused of crime is entitled as a matter of right to a speedy trial. It seems that this bill as at present framed is subject to the objection that the Government might by neglect make the appeal the means of prolonging the period of waiting for final trial. To the end that this particular objection may be met, I suggest that in line 20, after the word "cases, a semicolon be substituted for the period and the following amendment added:

Appeals in all such cases shall be taken within thirty days, shall be diligently prosecuted, and shall have precedence over all other appealed

I can readily understand how, by mere neglect or inaction on the part of the Government, a defendant could be kept indefinitely awaiting trial. That would seriously impair or invade a distinct constitutional right of the defendant. I can not conceive any objection to this expediting of appeals in such cases, because in the nature of things appeals must be perfected and disposed of before the defendant will be entitled to a trial on the merits. If the bill is in position at this time that it is subject to an amendment, I will offer the amendment.

Let me ask the Senator

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. CARTER. Oh, certainly.
Mr. HALE. I am very glad the Senator has made the suggestion. Is it not one of the inevitable results of obtruding the appeal by the Government and arresting proceedings that a prosecuting officer, unless some such amendment is adopted as the Senator has offered, may indefinitely prolong the condition of suspense of the accused and at last wear him out? Is it not a part of the proposition on which we have always gone that the any stage. I am willing to take the execution of the law, the ad- accused shall have a speedy trial and, in that regard, is not time a matter of the most essential importance in protecting the liberty of the citizen and the presumption, until he is convicted, that he is innocent?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly. The Senator's suggestion brings us back to the old and time-honored saying that "justice deferred is justice denied." I can readily perceive how through this appeal a defendant could be made to suffer indefinite suspense, and, as the Senator suggests, be utterly worn out in waiting a hearing or a day in court on the merits of the case presented against him.

I presume the amendment will be acceptable. I can conceive of no objection to it. It proposes that this character of appeal shall take precedence over all other pending appeals. I think that principle should obtain. I believe it would be better by far to allow the Government an appeal, so as to settle the law in future cases, even after the disposition of the defendant in the particular case, than to allow the judgment in the particular case in which the ruling obtained upon indictment in nisi prius court to be effective as to the Government without an oppor-tunity to settle the law as to future cases of like character. The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The Secretary. On page 2, line 20, after the word "cases," it is proposed to strike out the period and insert a semicolon and the following:

Appeals in all such cases shall be taken within thirty days, shall be diligently prosecuted, and shall have precedence over all other appealed

Mr. NELSON. Mr. NELSON. I can see no objection to the amendment. The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment. Mr. BACON. I ask the Senator if the phraseology ought not to be changed so as to include writs of error' Mr. NELSON. Yes; writs of error should be included.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the proposed amendment as modified.

The Secretary. It is proposed to modify the amendment, after the word "appeals," by inserting the words "or writs of error;" so as to make it read:

Appeals or writs of error in all such cases shall be taken within thirty days, shall be diligently prosecuted, and shall have precedence over all other appealed cases.

Mr. HALE. Let the Secretary read the text of the bill, so that we may see where this proposition, which certainly improves the bill very much, comes in.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested by the Senator from Maine.

Mr. NELSON. I will say to the Senator from Maine that it comes in at the end of these provisions and governs all of them.

Mr. HALE. That is the point I want to see—where it comes

The Secretary. At the end of line 20, page 2, of the bill. Mr. NELSON. At the end of the provisions relating to appeals.

Mr. HALE. What is the text of the bill immediately pre-ceding that? I do not ask to have the entire bill read, but only that part of it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

From the decision or judgment quashing or setting aside an indict-

From the decision or judgment quashing or setting aside an indictment;
From the decision or judgment sustaining a demurrer to an indictment or any count thereof;
From the decision arresting a judgment of conviction for insufficiency of the indictment;
From the decision or judgment sustaining a special plea in bar, when the defendant has not been put in jeopardy.
In all these instances the United States shall be entitled to a bill of exceptions as in civil cases.

The Secretary. Then it is proposed to insert-

Mr. HALE. Now read the amendment.

The Secretary read as follows:

Appeals or writs of error in all such cases shall be taken within thirty days, shall be diligently prosecuted, and shall have precedence over all other appealed cases.

Mr. HALE. So it will apply to all of the cases that are stated where the Government may intervene by appeal?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly. It applies to every one of them. Mr. MALLORY. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Minnesota what disposition will be made of the defendant or the prisoner in the event of the quashing of the indictment, in the event of granting a motion in arrest of judgment for insufficiency of the indictment, and an appeal to the Supreme Court by the Government is pending? What becomes of the party who has just been practically acquitted? Is there any way of holding him in custody?

Mr. NELSON. I presume in those cases the defendant would be under bond, and his bond would hold him.

Mr. MALLORY. But he has been acquitted practically by the granting of the motion in arrest of judgment. That sets him He has no bond. Then the granting of a motion in arrest of judgment is not equivalent to an acquittal?

Mr. NELSON. The motion is made by the defendant.
Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the amendment offered has been accepted, but I will make a statement of the time that may be occupied under existing law in perfecting one of these appeals. An appeal from a circuit court of the United States to the circuit court of appeals may be taken within six months, if my memory serves me correctly; it may be one year. To the Supreme Court of the United States an appeal may be taken at any time within two years. So it is obvious that the defendant, waiting for six months in the first instance and two years thereafter for the appeal to come up from the circuit court would be in rather an unfortunate position.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. Carter] as modi-

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. RAYNER. Before the bill is put upon its passage, may we hear the amendment of the Senator from Montana again? It has become a part of the bill. I will ask the Secretary to read it slowly.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will again be stated.

The Secretary. At the end of line 20, page 2, it is proposed to insert the following:

Appeals or writs of error in all such cases shall be taken within thirty days, shall be diligently prosecuted, and shall have precedence over all other appealed cases.

Mr. WHYTE. Has the bill passed beyond the stage when amendments can be offered?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has not. The bill is in the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. WHYTE. It is still open to amendment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is still open to amendment.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, I think if the Government gets change in the practice in the courts of the United States, which has lasted for more than a century, it ought to be limited in the character of that change; and I shall move to strike out all of the provisions in regard to appeals except the one in lines 13 and 14, on page 2, which is this:

From the decision or judgment sustaining a demurrer to an indictment or any count thereof.

For that purpose I propose to strike out the provisions in lines 11 and 12:

From the decision or judgment quashing or setting aside an indict-

And lines 15 and 16:

From the decision arresting a judgment of conviction for insufficiency of the indictment.

And lines 17 and 18:

From the decision or judgment sustaining a special plea in bar when the defendant has not been put in jeopardy.

I confess I am a little surprised at that clause, because of the fact that I presume a question of fact would arise on a special plea in bar, as, for instance, limitations; and therefore the defendant has been put in jeopardy. When he reaches the point that that fact saves him the indictment is found too late.

And beyond that I propose a change of verbiage, so as to make the amendment of the Judiciary Committee conform to the proposed amendments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland proposes amendments which will be stated by the Secretary.

The Secretary. Strike out lines 11 and 12, lines 15 and 16, and lines 17 and 18.

Mr. SPOONER. Strike out what?

On page 2 of the bill strike out lines 11 and Mr. WHYTE. 12, lines 15 and 16, and lines 17 and 18. I do not propose to strike out lines 19 and 20. I only amend it also by making it in the singular instead of the plural:

In this instance the United States shall be entitled to a bill of exceptions as in civil cases.

Mr. RAYNER. That leaves only lines 11 and 12? Mr. WHYTE. It leaves only this:

From the decision or judgment sustaining a demurrer $\ensuremath{\text{fo}}$ an indictment or any count thereof.

That gives the Government of the United States the trial of any question that arises upon the indictment itself, which is a matter of record, and I do not think the Government of the United States at this time ought to be entitled to a bill of exceptions on testimony, including the rulings of the court as to the admission or rejection of testimony. I think it ought to be confined to the strictly legal question arising on the indictment

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, the amendments proposed by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. Whyte] would utterly destroy the bill. It happens in many cases that the defendant instead of moving to set aside the indictment or to quash it and instead of demurring withholds all his objections to the indictment until after verdict, and then makes a motion in arrest of judgment on account of the insufficiency of the indictment.

Mr. WHYTE. Will the Senator from Minnesota yield to me for a moment?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. WHYTE. The clause expressly provides that he can only raise the question by a demurrer.

Mr. NELSON. No. Mr. WHYTE. It reads:

That hereafter all objections to the sufficiency of the indictment in matters of form only shall be made and determined prior to the im-matters of form only shall be made and determined prior to the impaneling of the jury.

Mr. NELSON. That relates only to matters of form and not to the substance of the indictment. The amendments of the Senator from Maryland are bad, and if adopted the bill will be utterly useless.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again state the amendments proposed by the Senator from Maryland [Mr.

WHYTE].

The Secretary. In line 10, page 2, strike out "instances" and insert "instance;" strike out lines 11 and 12, 15 and 16, 17 and 18, and change line 19 so as to read:

In this instance the United States shall be entitled to a bill of exceptions, as in civil cases.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendments proposed by the Senator from Maryland. [Putting the question.] By the sound, the noes have it.

Mr. CLAY. A division! Mr. HALE. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Money], and therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (after having voted in the negative). I voted, not observing that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. Stone] was not in the Chamber. I withdraw my vote.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, has the Senator from Iowa

So Mr. Whyte's amendments were rejected.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I was struck by the inquiry made by the Senator from Florida [Mr. Mallory] of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. Nelson] as to what would be the effect of the appellate proceedings on the defendant pending the appeal; and I understood the Senator from Minnesota to say that the defendant would doubtless be released on bond. As the law now stands, of course the defendant would be acquitted and would be entitled to his release, and it seems to me that, so far as the defendant is concerned, we should not put him in any worse condition by reason of the appeal than he would have been in had the proposed law not been passed. I suggest, therefore, the following amendment. After line 21 I move to insert:

In all such instances of appellate proceedings the defendant, pending the same, shall be released on his own recognizance.

It seems to me the plain purpose of the bill is to obtain a decision by the highest court of the land, and that its purpose is not to oppress the defendant in any pending case. stands to-day the order or judgment complained of would immediately release the defendant. If, then, we are going to subject him to all the embarrassment and oppression and anxiety of delay, why should we not, pending the proceedings, permit him to be released on his own recognizance?

Mr. KNOX. I wish to ask the Senator from Nevada a ques-

Does he not think that in the absence of a provision in the statute making the appeal a supersedeas the defendant would go free?

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, we can not hear the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am not prepared to say

Mr. KNOX. That is my own judgment about it.
Mr. NEWLANDS. If there is any doubt about it, I would prefer to make it certain in the law. The answer of the Senator from Minnesota seemed to imply that the defendant could be released, but only upon bond.

Mr. NELSON. I move to lay the amendment on the table.
Mr. BACON. Mr. President—
Mr. NELSON. I withdraw the motion.
Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator from Minnesota will not make that motion.

Mr. NELSON. I withdraw it.
Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I think the end to be accomplished by this bill is incorrectly stated by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. Newlands], that we may have the opportunity to settle important questions of law. It does not relate so much to the fortunes of the particular party who may be accused, so far as the desire of the Government may be to prosecute him ultimately. I agree with the Senator from Pennsylvania that that would be the effect of the bill as it now stands. I think the great object had in view by the provisions of the bill will be accomplished substantially even if a particular prisoner does I would very much prefer to run the risk of his going free without final trial rather than that this bill should not be passed in such shape that these questions may be ultimately determined by the court of last resort.

Therefore, while I will not do anything more than make a suggestion to the Senator from Minnesota as a friend to the bill, I trust that he will not make the motion to lay the amendment on the table. On the contrary, I would rather accept it, if I were in charge of the bill.

Mr. NELSON. In view of the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia I withdraw the motion and will let the proposition be voted upon directly.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS

Mr. KEAN. Let it be again stated. The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair would suggest that the amendment would come properly after line 20 instead of after line 21, as suggested by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NEWLANDS. After line 20? The VICE-PRESIDENT. After line 20. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The Secretary. After the amendment already adopted, line 20 on page 2, it is proposed to insert:

In all such instances of appellate proceedings the defendant, pending the same, shall be released on his own recognizance.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President, I offer as a substitute for the amendment the following:

Pending the appeal or writ of error the defendant may be in all proper cases admitted to ball or released on his own recognizance, in the discretion of the presiding judge.

I do not think that any man who is charged with murder, for instance, and who upon some technicality may have a demurrer sustained to the indictment, should be released on his own recognizance. Neither do I believe that a man who is charged with a serious crime or charged with violating any law should, unless the judge who presides at the trial of the case thinks it is best, be put at liberty upon his own recog-It is a matter which should be left, in my judgment, to the discretion of the trial judge. The rights of the Government should be protected just the same as the rights of the individual. Every man should surrender something for the good of the country, and in order that no injustice may be committed against any man. Therefore I hope that the sub-stitute will prevail and that the amendment will not,

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I simply desire to say, in reply to the suggestion of the Senator from Washington [Mr. Piles], that the great purpose of the bill is to secure the ultimate decision of the court of final resort on questions of law, and at the same time in no manner to change the present status of an accused person by reason of that proceeding. Under the present law, when there has been a decision sustaining a demurrer or other similar proceedings, the accused undoubtedly goes without bond or without imprisonment, subject only to be rearrested when another indictment is found. It seems to me that the spirit of the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada is in entire harmony with that fundamental thought in this bill to secure the decision ultimately of the question of law and at the same time not infringe upon any right that the defendant has under exising law.

For that reason I hope the substitute of the Senator from Washington will not be adopted, and that the amendment of the Senator from Nevada will be agreed to without amendment.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President-

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BACON. Certainly. Mr. PILES. I should like to ask a question. Is it not a fact that, under the amendment as proposed by the Senator from Nevada, the defendant may be released on his own recognizance in all cases?

Mr. BACON. In all cases.

Mr. PILES. Wherever there is an appeal?
Mr. BACON. Yes; in all cases. That is exactly what I should like to have done, in order that this bill may be absolutely freed from any possible feature by which any burden may be put upon a defendant other than that which now rests upon him under existing law. I want to have it cut entirely loose and to be free from any feature of that kind.

Mr. CARTER. Will the Senator permit a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.
Mr. CARTER. Under existing law, where an indictment is quashed, the court may order that the defendant be committed. In the exercise of that right, which all courts possess, the court may resolve itself into a committing magistrate for that purpose, having knowledge that a crime has been committed. The crime may be murder in the first degree. The indictment may have been quashed upon any technicality suggested by the Senator from Washington. Under the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada the right of the court to hold a defendant would be abridged. Unquestionably that can not be the intent of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. BACON. I suppose that under existing law before a court could hold a defendant there must be some affidavit or some presentation of the matter before him which would authorize the issuance of a warrant.

Mr. CARTER. Unquestionably, but this—
Mr. BACON. And if so, that would exist now.
Mr. CARTER. But this amendment constitutes a change of existing law, which would limit the power of the court to hold the defendant regardless of the condition.

Mr. BACON. I should think that the only effect of it would be that so far as this particular proceeding was concerned the accused could not be held under that indictment, but the court would have the same right to issue another warrant and to require another commitment in that case as it would in this. would be a proceeding independent of the authority given by the indictment which had been declared to be null and void.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I must confess that I bring myself with some reluctance to vote for this bill, but I am very anxious to avoid putting upon the defendant any additional The bill necessarily puts upon him the burden of burden. delay. I am not willing to put upon him the burden of a possible imprisonment unless he can secure bond. For that reason I favor a distinct statement in the bill that the appeal shall operate only for the purpose of procuring from the appellate court its construction as to the Constitution and not operate to put an additional burden and worng in the shape of an imprisonment upon the defendant. Under existing law when the order or judgment complained of is made the defendant is entitled to go free. It seems to me in shaping this law we ought to see to it that he is allowed to go upon his own recognizance pending the appeal.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed as a substitute by the Senator from Washington [Mr. Piles] to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. Newlands].

Mr. CARMACK. I desire to have the substitute read. The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again read the proposed substitute.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada insert:

Pending the appeal on writ of error the defendaz? may be in all proper cases admitted to ball or released on his own recognizance, in the discretion of the presiding judge.

Mr. PILES. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. Martin], and

Mr. FLINT (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. Balley]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). nounce my pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY]. I will state while on my feet that I make the announcement for the day, as I may not be in the Chamber at subsequent roll calls.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Has the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has not voted.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I have a pair with that Senator. take the liberty of transferring my pair to the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Gallinger], who is absent, and I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CLAPP (after having voted in the affirmative). I voted under the assumption that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Simmons], with whom I have a general pair, was in the Chamber. I will transfer my pair to the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. Dryden] and let my vote stand.

Mr. ALLISON. I am paired with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. Morgan]. I do not see him in his seat and

So Mr. Piles's amendment to the amendment of Mr. New-LANDS was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] as amended.

Mr. HEYBURN. I understand that the substitute having been adopted, it disposes of the amendment of the Senator from Nevada.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question now is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. Newlands] as modified by the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington [Mr. Piles].

Mr. BACON. I understand the effect of the vote which we have just taken is to put the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington in the place of the amendment offered originally by the Senator from Nevada.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is the effect of the vote.

Mr. BACON. It is adopted as a substitute for it and displaces it. Consequently what we are now called to vote upon is the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is the effect of it. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to inquire if it is the intention of the Senator from Minnesota to press the bill that has been under consideration to final passage this morning?

Mr. NELSON. I can not say just how far I will press it. My intention is to go on with it. It is getting late in the session, and in order to get such legislation enacted I should like to have it considered now

Mr. HEYBURN. With the understanding that if the debate is prolonged the regular order will be called up, I will consent.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will say to the Senator from Idaho that there are several other amendments to be offered to the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. I anticipate it. I myself intend to offer one.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Minnesota that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside?

Mr. HEYBURN. I object.
The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made. The unfinished business is before the Senate.

FRANCISCO KREBS-VETO MESSAGE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate:

Senate bill No. 5531, entitled "An act for the relief of Francisco Krebs," is returned herewith without approval for the reasons set forth in the following report from the Secretary of Commerce and Labor:
"In relation to Senate bill No. 5531, transferring Round Island, Miss-issippl, to Francisco Krebs, the Department hereby registers its objections to its passage. First, because it unduly restricts the extent of the light-house property on the island; second, because no means is specified in the bill for accurately determining the boundaries of the light-house property, and, third, because the Light-House Board has not authority over the growth of trees on the rest of the island, which might obscure its lights in certain directions. These objections are so important that the Department begs disapproval of the bill as passed." THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 4, 1967.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The message will be printed. The question is, Shall the bill pass, the objections of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. FRYE. It seems to me that the bill had better be referred to the committee that reported it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the bill and message will be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, from which the bill was reported.

LORENZO F. HARMON.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying bill, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate:

In compliance with the resolution of the Senate (the House of Repre-entatives concurring) of the 1st instant, I return herewith Senate bill o. 1879, entitled "An act granting an increase of pension to Lorenzo F. THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

ALICE M. STAFFORD-VETO MESSAGE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate:

read:

To the Senate:

I return herewith, without approval, Senate bill No. 2578 entitled "An act for the relief of Alice M. Stafford, administratrix of the estate of Capt. Stephen R. Stafford." The bill authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay Alice M. Stafford, administratrix of the estate of Capt. Stephen R. Stafford, late of the Fifteenth Regiment of Infantry, the sum of $1,371.87, that sum being the amount of money necessarily advanced and paid by him out of his own personal funds while post commissary at Fort Wingate, N. Mex., in the years 1879 and 1880, in order that the troops in said command might have fresh beef and necessary food during the fourteen months drought in which no rain fell in the region of said fort, and during which time the beef presented for issue by the beef contractor was of such poor quality as to be unfit for food for such command.

It appears from the records of the War Department that Captain Stafford, in the months of May and June, 1880, purchased beef in the open market to the amount of 19,975 pounds, at 12½ cents per pound, paying therefor $1,371.87 of Government funds. Of the amount so purchased he accounted on his returns for 4,975.75 pounds, of the value of $621.95, but failed to take up and properly account for 5,999.25 pounds, of the value of $749.92. This sum Captain Stafford accounts and was adjusted by the stoppage of $749.92 from his pay.

It will thus appear that the sum of $1,371.87, which the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to pay to the administratrix of Captain Stafford's estate, exceeds the amount of the stoppage and does not accurately represent the amount which was deducted from his pay in the final settlement of his accounts.

As the inclosed bill vests no discretion in the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to pay to the administratrix of Captain Stafford's estate, exceeds the amount which was deducted from his pay in the final settlement of his accounts.

The White House, February 4, 1907.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The message will be printed. The question is, Shall the bill pass, the objection of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. FRYE. I think the bill and message ought to be referred to the Committee on Claims. The committee may present a bill with an amendment. Evidently the sum of seven hundred and odd dollars is due the estate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine moves that the bill and message of the President of the United States be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

STATE PUBLIC SCHOOL SYSTEMS.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, on Thursday, February 7, immediately after the conclusion of the morning business, with the permission of the Senate, I shall call up Senate resolution 183, "Resolved, That in the opinion of the Senate this Government has no right to enter into any treaty with any foreign government ment relating in any manner to any of the public school sys-tems of any of the States of the Union," etc., and I will submit some remarks upon the questions raised by the resolution.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask to have the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. Carmack] assigned to duty upon the Committee on the District of Columbia to fill the vacancy occasioned by the retirement of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. Gearin].

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kentucky moves that the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. Carmack] be appointed to the Committee on the District of Columbia in the place of Mr. Gearin.

The motion was agreed to.

ISSUANCE OF LAND PATENTS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. Carter on the 9th ultimo, relating to the issuance of patents on homesteads, etc.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President— Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.
Mr. CLAPP. I desire to state to the Senate that on the completion of the speech by the Senator from Idaho I shall move to proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, on last Friday when the pending resolution was laid aside we had been engaged in the consideration of that feature of it which pertained to the forest reserves of the United States. It is my intention to-day to devote but very little more time to the consideration of that question in the discussion of this resolution. There is a bill pending before the Senate which by its terms provides that no more forest reserves shall be created by Executive order, but that they shall be created only pursuant to an act of Congress authorizing their creation. So I do not consider it important at this time to do more than connect the question of the forest reserves in their relation to the message which the President has sent to the Senate upon the public lands. I do desire, however, at this time to call attention to the fact that we already have something more than 127,000,000 acres of forest reserves in the United States, and the annual report of the Forester shows that in the State of Idaho alone there are upward of 18,000,000 acres of forest reserves. I could give the entire tabulated statement showing the number of acres in each State, but I do not at this time think it is necessary to do so.

WITHDRAWAL OF COAL LANDS.

I desire now to take up the question of the withdrawal of coal lands from purchase under existing law and the suspension of all action by the Interior Department upon the pending applications under existing law.

The effect of this official proclamation suspending action upon pending applications has resulted in the withdrawal of coal lands from entry to the extent of millions of acres, the quantity not yet determinable; but it has resulted in immensely enhancing the value of the coal lands already owned by private ownership; it has resulted in giving the existing coal operators an advantage which no governmental action should ever confer upon any portion of the citizens of the United States, because it is at the expense of the remaining portion of the citizens of the United States

Mr. President, the coal lands in the hands of existing owners have been more than doubled in value by reason of this Executive order. Their owners have taken advantage of this Executive order to advance the price of coal in every coal market in the United States. They have attempted to account for this advance sometimes on the alleged scarcity of cars and sometimes on the alleged scarcity of labor, but for one reason or another the fact remains that the people are paying for it.

Then there is no promise of any relief at all from this condition. We are not informed by the Executive that in six months or twelve months or two years conditions will change so that these lands may be restored to the field of competition against existing rights, but we are left to conjecture as to what may happen, if anything may happen, in the future that will restore the public domain to the people who own it.

WHO OWN THESE COAL LANDS?

There is a spirit of demarcation running all through this message that distinguishes between the Government and the people; that seems to treat the people in a patronizing way, as though they were a troublesome element in the Government, ignoring the fact that the people are the Government. These coal lands do not belong to the political organization which we call the "Government;" they belong to the individuals who constitute the Government, and who delegated to their representatives the authority to enact such necessary legislation as would make available to them, upon equitable and reasonable distributive conditions, the use of these public utilities. there is running through it all that undercurrent of sentiment that the people are a troublesome element in the Government. The people are very apt to resent that spirit. It is the people who own these coal lands; and when, by Executive order, they are withdrawn from the people, they are very apt to inquire why and for how long. The message suggests that these lands be held permanently by the Government-these coal lands, oil lands-lands productive of the great necessities of life.

Why, Mr. President, I can imagine nothing more in conflict with or antagonistic to the principles of our Government than that the political machinery of the Government should seize that which belongs to all the people and set up storekeeping or mining or productive industries in competition with individual business interests and productive industries. There can be nothing more destructive of the rights of the people than that the Government as a political organization should establish itself in business in competition with individual enterprise, and that is just what they are proposing to do.

SCARCITY OF FUEL.

What is the result? The property is withdrawn from contribution to the expenses of the Government through the medium of taxation. The Government may own in the State of Wyoming one-fourth of the land and hold it under this Executive order from development, except just as the Government may choose to develop it; from development, except as the Government may be fortunate enough to induce somebody to lease this land, which it will not be able to do. Those lands lie nonproductive, noncompetitive, noncontributive, and the remaining property interests in the State will be taxed in proportion to the nonproductive element, because the fixed charges of maintaining the State government are not changed by reason of the fact that these lands are withdrawn. They remain the same and they must be met; and if they can not be met through the ordinary medium of taxation and contribution, then they must be met in a larger measure by the private interests that happened to be existing before this frost and blight of political spirit fell upon them; and that is the situation that is suggested to us by this message proposing to lease the coal lands.

For an indefinite period it is suggested to establish as the permanent policy of the Government that the Government shall no longer sell its timber lands, its coal lands, its oil lands, or its grazing lands, but that the Government of the United States shall set up in the business of grazing, in the business of lumbering, in the business of coal mining or oil mining, in competition with existing rights, and, of course, with the result that hereafter capital would not seek that field of investment. Who can compete in private enterprise with the Government of the United States? What individual or combination of individuals can go into the coal business and successfully compete with the United States Government? As I said in my remarks a few days since, our wood yards have gone out of business. Because they could not compete with the Government of the United States in the wood market.

It was never contemplated, Mr. President, that the Government of the United States would engage in any productive industry whatever, except so far as might be necessary for its own immediate wants; and even then the broader and better policy of the Government has been at all times to purchase its supplies from those who produce in the field of individual enterprise.

Mr. President, I think I do not care to elaborate more upon the question of the leasing of these lands by the Government. except to emphasize the objection that it would render them noncontributive to the maintenance of the State governments. It will convert into a menace most legitimate and established business industries that come in competition with them, or else it would leave those lands lie idle and emphasize the monopoly that exists because of the present holding, and that at the expense of the people.

WELFARE OF THE PEOPLE.

Mr. President, it is suggested that this would be for the general welfare of the people. If we were a patriarchal government, the subjects of which were to be treated as children of a household, that might be true; but we are not. We are a household of equals in citizenship. Every citizen has attained his majority, and paternal influence does not control; but it is a government of equals. Therefore, we want no combination of officeholders, created by the people themselves to serve the purposes of the people, to, if I may use the expression, pat the people on the head and patronize them. Let the people through their legislative representative body, determine what is for their welfare; and when they have determined it, let no power on earth stay the hand of execution. To be told here in plain language that Congress is incompetent to protect the people in their rights or to determine what the rights of the people are, is a new doctrine, and one that the people will not take kindly to, though we may engage in long arguments and dissertations here as to Executive power, as to that unwritten power which has been claimed to exist, but which does not exist. There is no officer under this Government, or connected with it, that has any power, except that which is specifically given and plainly expressed through the statutes or that great instrument that is the boundary line within which statutes may be made to exist.

Mr. President, I want to call attention to another proposition here on page 3 of this message. Congress is asked by a message from the President to appropriate $5,000,000 in the nature of a loan to the Forest Service. We are told that the income is not sufficient to maintain it, but that, in the judgment of the Executive, by the year 1910 the forests will have become sufficiently remunerative to pay the expenses of running them, and in the meantime we are asked to appropriate $5,000,000 as a loan to this Bureau of the Government. I do not believe for a moment that there is any danger of Congress doing anything of the kind, especially in view of the fact that the Forestry Service, at least in the statement which it has sent to Congress, shows that there is absolutely no necessity for any such appropriation. There was a balance to the credit of the special fund of forestry on the 12th day of April, 1906-which was the last report-of $273,363.33, an irresponsible fund you might call it, placed in the hands of a department or bureau of the Government, which expends it, not as the Constitution of the United States says expenditures shall be made—pursuant to an act of Congress but which expends it upon its own determination as to the necessity or wisdom of making the expenditure. Nearly half a million dollars in the hands of a bureau, without any limitation or any classification as to the expenditure of that money, and then to ask us to give them $5,000,000, forsooth, on the security—I read the language:

The need is urgent. Accordingly I recommend that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to advance to the Forest Service, upon the security of standing timber, an amount, say, $5,000,000, sufficient to provide a reasonable working capital for the national forests.

The Government is going to pawn its timber and borrow $5,000,000 on it. That is what it amounts to. The money in the Treasury belongs to the Government, and it does not have to put up security when it wants to use it for the purposes of government. It appropriates it out of the Treasury by an act defining the purpose. It does not say "We will put up a certain number of acres of forest land or we will put up certain Government bonds if you will allow us to use this money. It appropriates it. But we have here a proposition that, on the credit of the forests, we shall loan a Department $5,000,000. The forestry service, if it has any status at all, is a part of the Government. It is not like loaning a million dollars to the Jamestown Exposition or $5,000,000 to the Portland Exposition, which were private enterprises.

I am inclined to believe that some of these gentlemen have actually persuaded themselves that these great forests—this 121,000,000 acres—is their private estate. They are treating 121,000,000 acres—is their private estate. it as though it were some great baronial forest, at the head of which is the forester, separate and distinct from the Government, so much so that they are authorized, because of their assumed importance, to go to the Treasury of the United States and borrow money and pledge—what? Their private holdings in the land? No; but pledge the property of the United States Government as security for it. What for? What do they want to use it for? In addition to this sum of two hundred and seventy-odd thousand dollars, which they have in hand or had when they made the report, they propose to expend this $5,000,000 for making trails on forest reserves. fences, cabins for the ranger, bridges, telephone lines, and other items of equipment without which the reserve can not be handled to advantage. They want $5,000,000 worth of cabins and trails!

Mr. President, here is a circular that they have issued showing how much regard they have for the rights of the local Under date of April 25, 1904, they issued this circular, which is in effect directed to the counties of the States. The counties exist by virtue of the provisions of the constitution of the State of Idaho. They are named and defined and delimited. They have certain rights under the law of the State of Idaho to make roads to open up the country in order that it may become productive and available for settlement. Years afterwards the Government, acting through its Forestry Service, goes in there, takes possession in the county in which I live of 80 per cent of the county and constitutes it a private forest reserve, in effect, upon which no man may set his foot against the wishes of a forester, upon which no man can remain an hour except with the consent of a forester, and they say to the county—which is as much a government as the General Government in its way and within the limits of its functions in regard to public highways-I read from the

In case of permit granted upon proper application filed by county commissioners or other duly authorized county officers for public wagon road right of way through forest-reserve lands, or for authority to occupy forest-reserve lands for public school purposes, or for other like public privilege, the formality of agreement and bond will not be required of them in the execution of their official duties in the case.

Application, however, must be filed in every instance, setting forth, after the manner of the regular form prescribed in such cases, so far as it may be applicable, the facts and needs of the particular case, and stipulating full compliance with the forest-reserve rules and regulations lations.

This application is to be forwarded by the forest officer, with his recommendation therein, to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, who may, in the exercise of his judgment, approve the same and permit the applicant to proceed without further formalities in the

Let us apply it. The county commissioners had expended a large sum of money upon a wagon road connecting what is known as the "South Fork" country with the St. Joe country. It was commenced before a forest reserve was even suggested. Settlement proceeded as a result of the roads and trails that opened up that new country. The Forestry Service, by proclamation, created a forest reserve that covers that wagon road. The expenditure had been made. The improvement of the country had followed, and yet it was all included within the forest reserve. What is the status now? The county's expenditure is rendered of no value to the county. The dominion and control incident to the public highway, built at the ex-The dominion pense of the county, has passed from the county to the Forestry Service. When they want to extend that road, as they do at this very hour, from the present terminal to a new country that lies beyond the forest reserve, they can not do it unless they make the application and it meets with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. They can not go out, as they formerly could, put a crew of workmen upon that road, and extend it according to the necessities of the hour; but they must allow the intervening weeks or months to elapse before their application can be submitted to the Interior Department, and, if it should be approved, that approval reach back to them. Mining camps spring up in that country, and the necessities are immediate for the opening up of roads and trails. They are not surrounded by conditions where you may take time, take a season or two, in which to provide roads and trails and other necessary approaches. You must do it at once; and yet, under these rules and regulations, a whole season would elapse before it might be done at all.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President—
The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. DEPEW. Would the Senator be in favor of the local authorities having the right, without scrutiny from the General Government, to run roads as they please through forest re-

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly. The State owns every sixteenth and thirty-sixth section of that land. It was granted to them for a purpose. It was granted to them in order that it might be made productive and contribute to the wealth of the State. How is it affected by having it included within a forest reserve and forbidding the State to open up their own lands? The land in a State is the inheritance of the people who go to the State, and not the people who sit back 3,000 miles away. they are interested in it, but their interest only becomes operative and practical when they go where they may avail themselves of it. Until they do, they have no concern in it, except to see the laws governing it are fairly and honestly administered.

Mr. DEPEW. Then would not the Senator's theory, if carried into practice, destroy the whole system of forest reserves? Mr. HEYBURN. I do not know whether it would or not, and I am not concerned about it. The system of forest reserves as now established and operated is so vicious that anything that would destroy it should be welcomed as a blessing to the whole people of the land.

Theoretically forest reserves would be all right. It sounds well to talk about protecting the forests. We are all in favor of it. No person is more so than those who make their homes in the vicinity where forests are. No one is more interested or as zealous in the protection of the forest than the State whose wealth depends upon conserving the natural resources that surround the State and lie within it.

The assumption that the men in the West are standing with drawn blades against these public utilities has no foundation whatever. The people in that country are the ones who are interested in preserving it. They are as good citizens, as virtuous, as zealous, as patriotic as those who live in the States of the East. Why should they all be suspected of wanting to destroy their own heritage? That is merely an idle fear on the part of men who have neither the desire, the interest, nor inclination to go to that country. But to the young men, the surplus population of the East, it is a land of promise and hope, and they do not go there for the purpose of destroying it.

They are its safest guardians; they are American citizens; they are American patriots, and the rights of the country can be as safely intrusted to them as it can to any person or any part of the people.

Mr. DEPEW. May I again interrupt the Senator?
The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McCumber in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. DEPEW. Is it not a fact that not the people of the Western States, but large companies, capitalized largely in the East, have denuded those States of the forests which are absolutely necessary for their agricultural maintenance and pro-

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I have heard that suggestion, but there is no foundation for it in fact. The largest land grabber-and I use that term advisedly, and I might apply it to the men whose fortunes have resulted from land grabbing-is one of the vice-presidents of the National Forestry Association of the United States. He owns more land the title to which was illegally obtained than any other man or all other men in the United States, yet he is one of the vice-presidents of the National Forestry Association, the president of which is our worthy Secretary of Agriculture. I have the list of officers of that as-I had intended to use it, but I have concluded to curtail the Forestry Service part of this discussion; so I will not go into it further than to say that the people of that country are the ones who are opposed to these large holdings of land. I would limit them down to a very narrow space. I believe the forest should come to the consumer through the medium of the customs mill. That is where I would bring it in.

I read in the paper yesterday that the vice-president of the National Forestry Association, which has its headquarters in Washington City and of which the Secretary of Agriculture is president, and the Chief Forester is one of the executive committee, is going to build in the neighboring county to that in which I live the largest mill in the world, and they are starting about building it now, for the purpose of working up these vast areas of timber that they have wrongfully obtained in the State of Idaho.

Mr. PERKINS. May I ask my friend the Senator from Idaho if the distinguished vice-president who owns this great area of timber land is a resident of the State of Idaho?

Mr. HEYBURN. No. I think he is a resident of Wisconsin or Michigan; somewhere there. Mr. DEPEW. Or California

Mr. PERKINS. Not of California. Mr. HEYBURN. Idaho has not risen to the dignity or the advanced civilization, I may call it, perhaps, which would induce those gentlemen of extreme wealth and habitual luxury to make their homes in it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President-

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho whether these large holdings were not acquired by the vicepresident spoken of before ever the forest reserves were established? And is it not impossible for him to-day to acquire such holdings where forest reserves have been established?

Mr. HEYBURN. No, Mr. President; they were not acquired before the forest reserves were created, but a number of them were aconired while we sat here in the vain supposition that we were heading off this land grabbing, and in another Department of the Government contracts were being rushed and hurried through in order that the ink might be blotted upon the signatures before we could vote upon the bill. At the proper time, when that matter is before the Senate, I will undertake to give details in reference to it, where it has been stated in a report that certain contracts had been made before we passed the act which shut out the exchange of lieu lands under the limitations of the act of 1906. I find by reference to an official circular which lies upon my desk that the date of the creation of the Santa Barbara Reserve is given as October 3, 1906, and yet I find a statement in the annual report of the Department which says that that contract had been made I think it was in the June preceding, and the forest reserves had not been created, according to their own circular, and yet they reserved the right to allow those lieu lands within that uncreated forest reserve to come within the exception of our statute, which was that it should not apply to existing contracts. But I will air that further on another occasion.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President-

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. DEPEW. It is only for a question, not for a speech. Is it not a fact, as the Senator has demonstrated, that the forest reserves have prevented the pernicious activity of other gentlemen as able and grasping as this vice-president in the direction of exhausting all the forests of the United States, and may we not give him credit, having got all he wanted himself and seeing the evils of it, of having become virtuous?

Mr. HEYBURN. That is somewhat on the theory of the man who, after he had gone into his neighbor's house and taken out all of the silver that was in it, should then step up to a policeman and say: "You had better keep your eye on that house; there are some burglars coming up the road and they may go there and take that man's property." That does not appeal

The fact is that these forest reserves are made, if not entirely, in part, through the contrivance, direct and indirect, of these large monopolies which, having already obtained a monopoly in so large a measure, would like to shut up every other acre of forest land in order that there may be no more competition. As I said on a former occasion when I was speaking about this question, every time a large area of forest reserve created lumber goes up in the open market from $2 to $5 a thousand; and why should it not? Suppose there are a hundred million acres of land available for a given purpose, and its value is based upon the productivity of the land; and suppose that one-half of the land is withdrawn from the field of production; would not the other half be worth as much as the whole was before one-half was withdrawn? Is not the remaining timber land that is owned by these people to-day worth just as much more as is represented by the proportion that that timber bore to the whole area? This is not a very elaborate proposition.

Now, I do not charge that any officer Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President-

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do. Mr. NEWLANDS. I will ask the Senator from Idaho whether, in case the laws providing for the forest reserves were repealed and they were all abandoned to-day, under existing law there would not be within the immediate future a concentration of these timber lands in the hands of great syndicates and monopolies such as he describes?

Mr. HEYBURN. There would not be, unless the officers of the Government were to shut their eyes and open the door so as to allow frauds to come in. I desire to answer that suggestion a little more fully.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will ask the Senator whether he re-

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire to answer that suggestion a little more fully than I have done.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I simply want to ask the Senator-The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield further to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I desire to ask the Senator whether he regards the present law relating to timber lands as adequate for the protection of the public, and whether he does not think it requires alteration and amendment?

Mr. HEYBURN. The timber laws? Yes; I would suggest that they be amended. The law as it exists now is not a perfect one. It can, however, be improved. This is what is required at present under the "stone and timber act," as it is called. It in terms protects the Government if it is enforced. and no law will protect the Government that is not enforced. It allows a man to take not to exceed 160 acres. He must be a qualified locater under the law. He must be a citizen of the United States or must have declared his intention to become

The land must be valuable chiefly for its timber. It must be unfit for cultivation. Is there any difficulty about determining that question? Are we to be told that the Executive Department of this Government is not competent to enforce the law which would prevent a man from taking agricultural land as timber land, when the law says on its face that the land must be unfit for cultivation? Then, again, it must be nonmineral.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President—

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the Senator from Nevada pardon me for a moment? I want to conclude the conditions.

The land must be nonmineral. Should there be any difficulty in enforcing that provision of the law? That is a question of fact. If it is mineral land, it can not be taken up under the stone and timber act. If it is fit for cultivation, it can not be taken up under the stone and timber act. It must be neither school sections nor State lands. If it is taken up, it is taken up subject to rights of way for ditches, etc., under the act of 1896. Why should there be any difficulty in enforcing a law

The Senator asked me, in effect, whether, if the forest reserves were thrown open, there would not be a rush for those lands. Those lands have been there during all the centuries that have passed over us. The trees have not been burned up. They have not been destroyed. They have not been stolen. No man ever cuts a tree except for some useful purpose and to the extent The Government has exchanged trees that it may be necessary. The Government has exchanged trees for men, forests for civilization. This is the policy which it should continue to pursue. I do not care if people go in there at the rate of a million a year and take possession of those forests. If they substitute their homes and their improvements for the solitude of those forests, the State and the nation are the beneficiaries.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President—
The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield further to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly. Mr. NEWLANDS. I unders I understand the Senator from Idaho to contend that there is no difficulty at all about ascertaining what lands are subject to timber entry; that they must be lands that can not be cultivated; that they must be timber lands; that they must be nonmineral lands. I assume, therefore, that the Senator must admit that these facts must be ascertained by a personal inspection of the ground, and yet the Senator is aware that in the Senate Chamber a proposition for an appropriation for agents for that purpose is being vigorously opposed. I do not know whether it is being opposed by the Senator himself, but it certainly is being opposed on this floor. Now, if the Government has not a sufficient number of men, expert and experienced, to make these examinations on the ground, how in the world is it to prevent lands which are not subject to timber entry from being taken up as timber lands, and how is it to prevent these evasions of the law, which we know have taken place in the past and which have resulted in the concentration of large areas of land in single ownership, against the policy of Congress?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not believe it should be necessary to argue that from the beginning of civilized government facts have been established through the medium of sworn testimony, and it has not been deemed necessary heretofore that every fact should be established only by inspection.

Now, the suggestion of the Senator is that unless you inspect the claim on the ground you can not determine its character. The law of Congress requires two witnesses, who have inspected it, to appear before the tribunal appointed by law for that purpose and testify under oath. Was the Senator here, I wonder, when the percentage of cancellation was stated a few days ago? Less than 1 per cent of all the applications for timber lands have been found fraudulent or mistaken, and a large proportion of that 1 per cent were canceled not for fraud, but for mistakes mistakes in complying with the rules and technicalities. With so small a percentage of fraud, if we admit it all to be fraud, is wisdom to close up the entire area of the country to create that solitude? Of course nothing but crime and murder can occur in those solitudes. No useful act that will contribute to the prosperity and happiness of human kind is apt to occur in those solitudes.

The county that lies south of the county in which I live expended $8,000 last year in trying men who had committed murder in forest reserves, which contribute nothing to the expense of maintaining the courts of the government that had to try

It is said that the reserves are there for the purpose of furnishing lumber. Let me give the Senator some idea of the extent to which they contribute in that way. I have it here in this This vast area of 121,000,000 acres of forest land for the first nine months of the last fiscal year produced the magnificent sum of $257,000 for all purposes. The Desert of Sahara will produce a larger income than that. Take the people's land and withdraw it from production under the pretense of protecting it from the people who themselves own it. It is the people who own these forests, and they want to use them for their own legitimate purposes, and yet under this system of Executive orders, made with the permission of Congress, they have been with-drawn from the people as though the people were a common enemy, and they have been turned over to a bureau that has treated them as though they were a private estate.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President—
The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.
Mr. McCUMBER. I have listened with a great deal of pleasure to the Senator's explanation of the rights of the people, and I agree with him in what he has stated in the main. But I want the Senator, if he will, before he gets through to give us a remedy for the evil of which he complains. In speaking of the very point that the Senator his discussed, that the people should have those timber lands, I desire to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the people had timber lands in the Appalachian chain, and now the same people are asking the Government to appropriate many millions of dollars to reforest the land. I simply call the Senator's attention to that fact, not for the purpose of criticising in the least degree his position, but that he may explain, in view of the fact that there are two sides to the question, where we should draw the line. We do not want all the country deforested. We want some forests to protect us against floods and to hold the waters for irrigation purposes and for other proper purposes. I should like to have the Senator explain where we should draw the line.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will briefly suggest to the Senator what seems to me to be at least in a measure a solution of the problem. In the first place, the Appalachian range was originally covered with an entirely different class of timber and it is of a different soil. The forest was taken not for the purpose of building up that country, but for the purpose of building up some other country. In the forests of Idaho—I take Idaho merely as an instance, because it serves the purpose—the people want the timber to build up Idaho. They want to take the timber for their own home purposes, and in order that it may be available for that purpose they want the people to have the right to be upon the soil, and the remedy lies in surveying that land and saying to the people there and elsewhere, "Here you can have a homestead, well timbered, well watered, and," in the language of the old advertisements, "convenient to places of public worship." That is what they want.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President—

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to develop the answer to the Senator from North Dakota, but I will yield to the Senator

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator referred to all the vast areas that have been withdrawn by the Bureau of Forestry, and recited the fact that last year only two hundred and fifty-odd thousand dollars had been collected from the sale of timber. I should like to ask the Senator if he knows of a single case where a person or a company has made application to the Bureau of Forestry for a permit to cut timber within a forest reserve and it was denied!

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I do not know anything about the details of it, nor is it material to be considered. They must have granted some, because I have here their official statement, and is not material that they should have denied applications. I do know this, that the conditions are such that only people situated in a peculiar way can take advantage of it. I do know that they advertised for sale—I think it was 16,000,000 feet—in the neighborhood of Boise City last fall, and I do know that the stool-pigeon of a lumber company bought it and turned it over to the big lumber syndicate. I know that is the way it

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President-

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will permit me, I desire to speak a little further along the line suggested by the Senator from North Dakota, because that is a very pertinent inquiry. I am not one of those who believe in tearing down something unless you are able to replace it with something equally as good or better.

Mr. SMOOT. That is very proper. I want to call the atten-ion of the Senator to the fact that, so far as my State is con-cerned and so far as my experience goes, no person or persons ever made application for timber upon a reserve but that he or they have been granted the right of cutting, whether they were small concerns or large concerns.

Mr. HEYBURN. In the State of the Senator from Utah, according to this annual report, the timber sales amounted to $8,265.13. I know of little country lumber yards in our country that do more business than that in a year, or they did when they could get the lumber. There was received from grazing within forest reserves in Utah from July 1, 1905, to March 31, 1906, $3,402.91. I read from the official report published by the Department.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me ask the Senator right here if one of the troubles is not due to the fact that we have reserved about five times as much land that is not timber land as we have land that is actually good forest land?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. They have reserved in the State of Idaho 2 acres of nontimber land for every acre of forest land reserved; and they confess it. They are creating new reserves all the time for the avowed purpose of making pastures, and then they are granting special privileges upon those pasture lands to the exclusion of others having an equal right as citizens to participate in the enjoyment of the public lands. They are granting special privileges, and I have in my mind an instance, as I have the letter in my files, of a man who recently bought 6,000 sheep in Washington County, assuming of course that he could get land on which to graze his sheep. When he went to the Forester to get land on which to graze his sheep, he was told that the lands had all been apportioned under the special-privilege rules. He wrote me, saying, "I have the sheep, but I do not know what to do with them."

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator if he knows whether those sheep had grazed before that in Idaho or in some other State?

Mr. HEYBURN. That is going too much into details. It is just that kind of details that is driving those people out there frantic and driving them across the line into Canada, as the Senator from Montana [Mr. Carter] said the other day. It is just such little petty annoyances. A man ordinarily should have the right to graze upon the public domain. I believe in free pasturage on the public domain. It belongs as much to one person as to another, and it is not within the spirit of the laws of this country that special privileges should be granted to any man, carved out of that which belongs to all, a part excluded and a part permitted to enter. The Government is not in the grazing business, or it should not be, or in the lumber business, or in the coal business.

Mr. SMOOT. All that I can say about it is that, so far as our State is concerned, if there was no regulation of grazing privileges there it would not be very many years until there would be no grazing land at all; it would be completely eaten up. No stock, either sheep or cattle, could live in our State if there had not been some kind of regulation upon the use of grazing land.

Mr. HEYBURN. Let Congress, then, make a regulation. If there are grazing lands and they should be used for that purpose, let us not pretend to make a forest reserve and at the same time make it for the purpose of grazing.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have gone enough into details. Other Senators perhaps will develop these facts in the further discussion of the question. I desire now simply to call attention to the purpose I had in entering upon this discussion. I have been asked for the remedy against the fraud of which this message complains. The remedy lies apparently in taking jurisdiction from the Department of the Interior and placing it where it should originally have been placed under the Constitution. For that purpose I have introduced the land-courts bill, which would establish a complete system for the determination of every question of right, whether it be between the Government and the individual or between individuals. The land courts would be established for that purpose, would have jurisdiction of no other subject, and would be unembarrassed by any other condition. The expense of it would be so infinitely less than that now incurred in administering the law in this unequipped and confessedly incompetent tribunal that there is no room for hesitation in making the change.

EXPENSE OF LAND COURTS.

Here are some figures: I said the other day that these land courts in the aggregate would not cost to exceed $135,000 a year. That includes all of the judges and the appellate courts and the clerks—$135,000 a year. The special agents alone now in the Interior Department, before we have complied with the earnest request that is made for additional ones, cost $95,100 a year. I have the figures here of the Department—$95,100 for the little handful of special agents who are now at work—and the Department wants enough to examine every claim upon the ground before the title passes. There are now 53,000 entries suspended. Twelve months from now there will be 153,000 of them, and we could not get the special agents into the field, if we were to try, inside of twelve months. At that time there would be 153,000 claims to be examined on the ground. It would take 5,000 special agents to do it. Then those special agents' reports come in here, and it will take another several thousand men to examine the reports of the special agents and read them and harmonize and determine whether or not on the reports of the special agents the Government shall pass title. That will be the situation, and the special agents required to do this work would cost more than $3,000,000 a year.

By substituting these land courts at the expense of $135,000,

By substituting these land courts at the expense of $135,000, which would try these controversies as other controversies are tried, you get rid of the difficulty of which you now complain, and when this court renders a judgment, the bill which I have introduced and which I shall ask upon the conclusion of my remarks to be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary provides that the decree or final judgment of the land court shall be binding upon the executive branch of the Government and that the patent shall issue upon the filing of that judgment or decree.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President-

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me ask the Senator why the register and receiver could not be the land court the same as they are now, and then all the proofs, instead of being made in other sections, could be made before the register and receiver, and that decision could be made conclusive, subject only to the right of appeal?

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to answer that right from the record here. Of course they might be, but the President's message of January 25—I have it not before me—provides that the judgment of those officers shall not be taken into consideration; that unless the testimony before the register and receiver was taken in the presence of an examiner the judgment of the register and receiver shall not be taken as to authorize the issuance of patent. That is plainly stated in the message of January 25. So those officers have been ignored and set aside.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will allow me, I understand the method is almost universal in cases of this kind to take testimony not before the land office, but to take it before some court commissioner or other officer. It is so at least in my State. The testimony is taken at such a time that the examiner can be present, and after it is taken the case passes upon his approval. If it is not taken at such a time as he can be present, it is held in the local land office until the examiner has visited the land in question.

I do not know whether that is the system in vogue in Idaho and farther west in the mountainous sections or not; but if we are going to have a court and bring every case before the court, why not utilize the officers we now have and have a double court, one a check upon the other, and have the benefit of the judgment of both the receiver and the register and have the special examining agent present at all the hearings?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, in uncontested cases the register and receiver now pass them and they go forward for final patent. The examination before the commissioner to which the Senator refers is taken in case of final proofs, not in case of original entries. It must be made in the land office. The qualifications of the applicant must be determined in the land office. Under the provisions of law the final proofs may be taken before a commissioner, and he sends his report in writing to the land office. Where there is a contest the contest may be carried on in the land office. The testimony, as a matter of fact, is taken in a little room connected with the land office, lasting sometimes throughout weeks, and it is written down there. Generally it is written manually. Where they have no allowance for clerk hire or for stenographers it has to be written down in longhand. That is the practice. That practice would not be disturbed. It is only in contested cases that the land courts would act.

I will put into the Record at this time a statement which I have here showing that the appeals are large in number. It is a statement made from 1881 to 1905 of cases appealed to the Secretary of the Interior, in which decisions have been written and are recorded in the books. The total number is 14,281.

Mr. HEYBURN. From an actual examination of the records in the land office the legal officer there will have to decide from six to ten cases per day, some of them involving small interests and some of them large interests. No man can decide so many cases in a day, examining the records as he must, and arrive at a conclusion that will be universally fair or reasonably fair to all the parties concerned. It can not be done,

In the Department of the Interior, to which appeals lie from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, the number of cases is even much larger-mining cases and land cases. Those contests are tied up there waiting for the report of the special examiners. There are some 4,700 of them, if I remember the figures aright. They are now accumulating every day.

The purpose of creating these courts is to determine the contested cases and to make a forum in which contests can be presented. The uncontested cases would go right along as at present. The officers of the land offices of the United States, as a rule, are not attorneys. If they are, they are not attorneys of a grade that would be selected to determine very large interests, because the salary is small.

I do not intend to prolong this discussion to any greater length, except that I will also insert at this point a statement showing the number of mining contests appealed from the United States land offices to the Commissioner of the General Land Office in ten years and the number of appeals from the Commissioner of the General Land Office to the Secretary.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Memorandum.]

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire to have inserted in the RECORD a certified photographic copy of a map of Idaho showing the lands that have been withdrawn from settlement. In this map the dark areas represent the forest reserves that have been with-drawn. I have a map with the figures on it which I will offer to be printed in the RECORD, with the consent of the Senate. The dark areas represent the forest reserves, amounting to something over 18,000,000 acres.

Mr. DEPEW. What percentage is that of the total lands of the State? Mr. HEYBURN. Forty-two and a half is, I think, the per cent. I have a map giving it officially. I thought I had it here.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand the Senator to say that about 42 per cent of the lahds of the State are in forest reserves.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will give it exactly.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to know what percentage of that 42 per cent is in actual forest and what portions are prairie land, and what portions are what we call, generally, scrub land, with no trees that could be said to be forest trees?

Mr. HEYBURN. Of the 18,000,000 acres included within forest reserves the merchantable forest lands do not exceed 8,000,000 acres. The system of pasturing forest reserves is so inconsistent with the theory of forestry, which contemplates allowing the younger growth to come along and succeed that which is necessarily removed, as to present an absurdity upon its face. They are pasturing on the forest reserves something like three or four million sheep, cattle, and stock of various kinds that eat up all the new growth as fast as it appears above the surface and nibble off all the little branches and young trees that might make other forests or renew the forests in years The fact is that the forestry system is a great system for the purpose of gathering this land together and letting it out for pasturage to those who are so fortunate as to get it and excluding from it those who are not so fortunate as to

The State of Idaho constructed a wagon road, intended to connect the two ends of that State, at an expense of something over $300,000. They completed it, I think, before 1895, before there was a forest reserve created, except the Bitter Root Reserve, which is the one reserve in the center of the State which is not small, but comparatively small. Along came the forest reservers and placed forest reserves over portions of that road that cost more than $175,000 and took possession of it, and the State itself is there now on its own road only by the grace of the forest reservers. That road was intended to allow the immigrants landing in the east end of the State intersected by railroads to pass easily into the interior and settle and take advantage of the opportunities to make homes there. Yet they can go there now over that State wagon road only by the grace of the Forester and subject to the rules and regulations of the Forestry Service.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President-

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. CLAPP. That depends upon the nature of the request. I expected to move the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill. Does the Senator wish to take any time?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state to the Senator from Minnesota that I wish to address the Senate on the pending resolution, which constitutes the unfinished business of the Senate.

Mr. CLAPP. I think in view of the state of the public business we ought to hasten along with the appropriation bills.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to address the Senate at some length, probably half an hour, and I might take up more time if there are interruptions.

there are interruptions.

Mr. CLAPP. I hardly know what to say. I feel that we ought to proceed with the appropriation bill. At the same time I do not want to interfere with anyone. I should like to have an understanding as to how long it would take, for the benefit of those Senators who are waiting for the appropriation bill to come up.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask the Senator whether he would be able to finish the consideration of the bill this afternoon.

Mr. CLAPP. I was in hopes this afternoon to complete the unobjected portion of the bill, and also to complete the amendments that have been suggested by the Department and which were printed Saturday night. That would bring us down to those items which would be contested and we would be ready then to-morrow to proceed with them. I think in probably an hour or an hour and a half's time we could do what I had in mind for to-day.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the appropriation bill if the reading of the bill has been completed at the desk?

Mr. CLAPP. No, sir; only about 80 pages.

Mr. McCUMBER. It would probably take the rest of the afternoon to complete the reading and do what the Senator has suggested.

Mr. CLAPP. I think in an hour and a half we may complete the reading and complete the Department amendments, which I will suggest as we go along with the reading.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will ask permission, then, to go on im-

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will ask permission, then, to go on immediately after the routine business to-morrow morning.

Mr. CLAPP. I think it would perhaps better conserve the business of the Senate if the Senator went on this afternoon. Then we can take up the appropriation bill either after the Senator gets through to-night or to-morrow morning, and not be interrupted. If it is agreeable to the Senator from Nevada he can go on now, and at the conclusion of his remarks I will move to take up the bill.

Mr. HALE. Before the Senator from Nevada goes on—I was called out of the Chamber on appropriation bills—I want to ask a question of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. Heyburn], who has, I may say, interested us all by his forceful presentation of this case. The Secretary of the Interior has been very sharply censured all through this debate. My impression about that official is that he is a capable and honest public servant, and that whatever mistakes he may have made do not in any way touch his integrity or his capacity as an administrator.

But over and above the jurisdiction that he exercises is the control of all these matters by the President of the United States. I wish to ask the Senator whether in these troubles, and in this serious mischief which has come to his constituents and to the people of other States, as these have arisen they have been laid before the President of the United States, and what action, if any has been taken. Of course I know about the message, and all that; but has appeal been made, as troubles have arisen, from the Secretary to the President?

Mr. HEYBURN. I will say first that not a word that I have uttered was intended to imply that the Secretary of the Interior or the President of the United States were or could be guilty of purposely doing a wrong act or perpetrating an injustice, but that they were misinformed or uninformed as to the facts, and that, because of being misinformed or uninformed, they have been led into doing those things which have resulted as I have suggested. But I have not attacked or intended to attack their honor as men or as officials.

Mr. HALE. I do not understand that the Senator has. He is very careful about those things. My point was whether when these troubles and grievances have arisen the Senator and those associated with him in remedying the grievances have laid the case before the President of the United States, and whether the policy which the Senator gravely believes is unfortunate and mischievous has been approved not only by the Secretary but by the President.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; upon an insufficient understanding. But I will say to the Senator that there is published at the expense of the Government a pamphlet which is quite extensive and which contains the correspondence between the President and myself in regard to a large portion of the matters that have been under consideration. In that I set forth as clearly and as fully as I could the evils that were being worked upon our people by the creation of these forest reserves. But as to the matters confained in the President's message, which I have been particularly discussing on this occasion, of course, many of them have only arisen within a few days.

I could not know, and I did not know until that message came to the Senate, that the President contemplated suspending these entries or withdrawing these lands. I have not been asked to confer about it. He having in a public message to the Senate stated these things, I could not appropriately go before him and discuss them, except I was invited to do so, as it would seem like a voluntary criticism of an act already performed by him. The first intimation I had, and, I think the first intimation any member of this body had, that the President was going to suspend the entries which had been made by the homesteaders and the mining claimants and the coal claimants and desert entrymen was when that message came here.

So far as I was concerned personally, I must say I never was more surprised at a position taken upon a public question than I was when I read that message advising us, not that these things would be done, but that they had been done; so any question involved in that message has not been discussed with the President, but the questions in regard to the forest reserves have been discussed fully, and there is a document which was before the Senate, and which probably may be found among the Senate documents, in connection with this matter, that sets forth the correspondence between the President and myself. It is accompanied by maps and with the most careful, painstaking showing that could be made in the matter.

Mr. HALE. What I was uncertain about was whether the Senator and those joining with him in a common object, before bringing the matter here, had exhausted every remedy in the executive department of the Government, including the President?

Mr. HEYBURN. I think I may safely say that, as far as my connection with it goes, I have exhausted every possible argument that I could present.

Mr. McCUMBER. While the Senator is on his feet, with the permission of the Senator from Maine, I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho who initiates each new scheme of a separate timber reservation or any of these reservations. Do they come from the President upon the advice of the Secretary of the Interior, or does the Secretary act upon the advice of the President? I judge from the remarks that were made the other day by the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] that the President acted upon what he designated as the "information or misinformation" of the Secretary of the Interior, and now it seems that the Secretary of the Interior acts upon the suggestion of the President. I do not know who looks this matter up. I suppose it is initiated with the Forest Service, the commission or Bureau, and they present the matter both to the President and to the Secretary of the Interior, but mainly they make their reports to the President and the Secretary of the Interior simply carries out the order of the President, which is made upon the recommendation of the Bureau of Forestry. If I am in error, I should like to be corrected on that point.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think I can state the facts accurately. There is a certificate (I have it on my desk, but am unable at this moment to put my hands on it) in which the Chief Forester, or the Secretary, I am not sure which, but at least the head of a department, requests the foresters in charge in the field to suggest any suitable land which comes under their observation that should be converted into forest reserves. So I assume from the circulars and the correspondence, copies of which I have, that probably all of the recent forest reserves have been created at the suggestion of the foresters in the field. They see a domain spread out before them that they think they would like to have under their jurisdiction, and they write describing it, the Chief Forester puts his initials upon it, and it goes to the Secretary, and he assumes that these men in the field have acted wisely in recommending it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Right there I should like to ask whether it goes to the Secretary or to the President.

Mr. HEYBURN. I can give more definite information. I have the circular before me. It is as follows:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,

FOREST SERVICE,
Washington, September 21, 1905.
Forest Reserve Order No. 10. Reserve boundaries.

To forest officers in charge:

Report by November 15 what areas, if any, contiguous to your reserve are suitable for reserve purposes. These areas will be fully examined and reported upon by the section of reserve boundaries during the next field season. Suggest also, for similar study, any other areas of which you have knowledge. Your report should locate by legal subdivisions, if possible, the lands recommended, and should briefly describe the character of the country.

OVERTON W. PRICE.

OVERTON W. PRICE, Acting Forester.

So, of course, he is acting for Mr. Pinchot, the Chief For-ter. That issues from the Office of the Forest-Reserve Service, which is now a part of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. McCUMBER. What I want to get at is whether that goes to the President or whether it is made to the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. HEYBURN. It is made to the Chief Forester, and by the Chief Forester to the President. Mr. McCUMBER. Then the President is the officer who dlrects the reservation?

Mr. HEYBURN. The Secretary of the Interior merely carries out the suggestions of the President. That is correct.

Now, in connection with this matter, at this time I ask to have inserted in the RECORD a document which I send to the desk, which is a consideration of the question as between the reserves and the school lands.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, permission is granted.

The document referred to is as follows:

The State's title to its lands. Open letter from Senator Heyburn to the Idaho Daily Statesman, in reply to editorial of February 6, 1906, in regard to forest reserves in Idaho.

United States Senate, Washington, D. C., February 14, 1906.

IDAHO DAILY STATESMAN, Boise, Idaho.

GENTLEMEN: My attention is directed to an editorial in your issue under date of February 6, 1906, under the heading of "HEYBURN'S speech."

This editorial evidently being intended as a review of my recent under date of February 6, 1906, under the heading of "Hexburn's speech."

This editorial evidently being intended as a review of my recent speech in the Senate on the forest-reserve question, I feel it my duty to direct your attention to some manifest misconceptions or errors on your part in dealing with this subject.

It would hardly seem fair to attribute your failure to comprehend the real points at issue in the forestry controversy to ignorance or inability on your part to understand and comprehend the scope of the legal questions presented in my speech affecting the title of the State to the sections 16 and 36 granted by Congress to the State of Idaho for public school purposes by the admission act of Idaho into the Union. I am therefore compelled to assume that in maintaining the position assumed by you upon these questions you would waive the legal rights of the State to these lands, and that in discussing the question you would disregard such rights rather than confess to the manifest error into which you have been led by overzeal in espousing the cause of the Forester upon sentimental grounds, actuated to some extent by your antagonistic personal feelings toward myself. That there may hereafter be no mistake as to the question involved, as to its fair presentation to you, I take this occasion of crystallizing the legal questions involved, stripped of all sentiment. all sentiment.

THE STATE'S TITLE TO ITS LANDS.

The State's title to sections 16 and 36 is based upon section 4 of the act of Congress approved July 3, 1890, providing for the admission of Idaho into the Union.

This section reads as follows:

"That sections Nos. 16 and 36 in every township of said State, and where such sections, or any parts thereof, have been sold or otherwise disposed of by or under the authority of any act of Congress, other lands equivalent thereto, in legal subdivisions of not less than one-quarter section, and as contiguous as may be to the section in lieu of which the same is taken, are hereby granted to said State for the support of common schools, such indemnity lands to be selected within said State in such manner as the legislature may provide, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior."

Section 5 of the same act provides:

"That all lands herein granted for educational purposes shall be disposed of only at public sale, the proceeds to constitute a permanent school fund, the interest of which only shall be expended in support of said schools.

disposed of only at public sale, the proceeds to constitute a permanent school fund, the interest of which only shall be expended in support of said schools.

"But such lands may, under such regulations as the legislature shall prescribe, be leased for periods of not more than five years, and such lands shall not be subject to preemption, homestead entry, or any other entry under the land laws of the United States, whether surveyed or unsurveyed, but shall be reserved for school purposes only."

Mineral lands are expressly excluded from this grant, so that the grant is a present, absolute grant to all nonmineral sections 16 and 36 the title of which rested in the United States at the date of admission, whether such lands were surveyed or unsurveyed.

Article 9 of the constitution of Idaho provides for education and the administration of the school lands of the State, and provides that the public school fund of the State shall forever remain inviolate and intact; also provides with rigid care for the administration of these school lands for the purposes expressed in the constitution, and for no other purposes whatever; and also provides that no school lands shall be sold for less than $10 per acre, and that they shall be sold only by public sale, and that not to exceed 25 sections of school lands shall be sold in any one year, and that they shall not be sold in subdivisions to exceed 160 acres to any one individual or company or corporation. The people of the State of Idaho will permit of no lax or forced construction of these constitutional limitations.

It will be observed that the granting words in the section of the statutes above quoted are: "Are hereby granted to said State." Those words have been construed by the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Schulenberg v. Harriman (21 Wall., 44), and a long line of decisions reaffirming this doctrine in which the court holds that such words of grant constitute a grant in presenti, and that the title, by virtue of such grant, passes from the United States to the grantee absolutely, and is no longer subject to any action or control on the part of the Government or any of its branches.

This is applicable only to the lands comprising sections 16 and 36, the title to which was in the United States on the date of the passage of the Idaho admission bill.

The provisions in the act for the selection of lieu lands applies only as stated, in section 4, to such sections, or parts thereof, as had been sold or otherwise disposed of by or under the authority of the act of Congress at the date of the passage of the admission act of Idaho. For such sections 16 and 36 as had been sold, or otherwise disposed of, prior to the admission act, the State is allowed to select lieu lands in the manner prescribed in section 4 of the act, and not otherwise. And as to such lieu lands the title of the State under the act was not in presenti, but is an inchoate grant to attach when such lieu selections are made.

The real contention on the part of the State is that the title for all made.

The real contention on the part of the State is that the title to all sections 16 and 36 within the State, the title to which was in the Government at the date of the admission act, passed co instanti and absolutely from the Government to the State, without further act on the part of either the Government or the State to perfect such title. No selection was necessary because the act designated the land by recognized subdivisions. That as to the lieu lands, or any other lands granted by the State for educational purposes, the grant was not in presenti, such grant being by its terms subject to selection in the future, and the title to such lands would only vest when selection was made and approved.

presenti, such grant being by its terms subject to selection in the future, and the title to such lands would only vest when selection was made and approved.

The decision on which the Forestry Bureau has based its claim of right to include sections 16 and 36 within forest reserves has been based upon an erroneous construction of the statute, and which falled to recognize the distinction in the class of title which passed under the admission act to the different grants of land. The Department has erroneously considered the rule stated by the United States Supreme Court in the case of Heydenfelt v. Daney G. & M. Co. (93 U. S., 634); New York Indians v. United States (170 U. S., p. 18); Hall v. Russell (101 U. S., 503) as applicable to the sections 16 and 36 granted to the State of Idaho by the admission act. In each of the foregoing cases, and in all other cases holding as they do, the granting words were "shall be granted," or other words of similar import, which are not words of present grant, but of a grant in future. Such States as Nevada, Utah, and many others were admitted by proclamation pursuant to an act enabling the Territories to form a government, but Idaho, having adopted a constitution and formed a State government, was admitted to the Union without an enabling act, and being in a position to then receive the grant, the grant was in the act expressed in such terms as made it operative upon signing the bill, so far as the sections 16 and 36, to which the Government then held title, were concerned.

The erroneous construction of the law by the Forestry Department as to the time of the attaching of the grant has resulted in it falling into error, under which it has attempted to take from the State the title to sections 16 and 36 granted to it by the admission act for common school purposes.

It is not a question of what it may be desirable to do in the way of to the time of the attaching of the grant has resulted in it falling into error, under which it has attempted to take from the State the title to sections 16 and 36 granted to it by the admission act for common school purposes.

It is not a question of what it may be desirable to do in the way of creating forest reserves; it is a question of power. Congress can not divest the State of the sections 16 and 36 which passed by the admission act, and the Executive Department of the Government can exercise no more control over these sections than it can over the title to other private property. Neither the legislature, the governor of the State, the land board, nor the courts of the State of Idaho can divest the State of its title to these sections by any act or by acquiescence in the act of another.

The sections 16 and 36 in the splendid timber lands of northern Idaho to which the State has an absolute title, notwithstanding anything that may have been done or that might be done by either Congress or the President or the State officials, are the property of the State of Idaho, to be disposed of only in the manner prescribed by the constitution—that is, by public sale after advertisement in the manner prescribed. The title can not and will not pass by any other method. It is not a question of policy, but one of power. If the State government of Idaho through any of its departments charged with the duty of protecting the State's rights in preserving its property have either by oversight, neglect, or a misconception of their legal duty or of the rights of the State allowed others to take possession of these sections, or exercise control or dominion over them, or to obtain what might be or might seem to be a paper title to them, then such action on the part of such officials has been absolutely void and has tended in no manner to destroy the title of the State in these sections. They were donated for a sacred purpose and under conditions that admit of no change. The legislature has no power to dispose of the State, you lands to drift into the hands of private speculators or under the control of nonproductive forest reserves. In disregard of the rights of the State, they will express themselves in no uncertain terms in favor of maintaining the title and the rights of the State to these lands, and they will demand a strict accounting at the hands of any officers of the State—executive, legislative, or judicial—who are responsible for the loss or diversion of a single section of these lands. It is absurd to talk about the State being compensated by the selection of grazing lands or lands adapted only to reclamation in lieu of these forest lands, that to the extent of vast areas will scale from 3,000,000 to 12,000,000 feet of white pine timber to the section.

It has been so often and conclusively decided by the Supreme Court feet of white pine timber to the section.

It has been so often and conclusively decided by the Supreme Court of the United States that there is no power in either the Executive Departments of the Government or of the State to exchange or trade off these lands except in pursuance of the direct provisions of the act of Congress and of the legislature of the State authorizing such exchange that any attempt to do so along the lines so buoyantly champloned by you heretofore amounts to an absurdity, and would result only in leading people into acquiring imaginary titles that would melt away upon a legal determination of the rights of the parties and of the State, and leave them wiser but poorer because of their experience.

There is no power on earth that can exercise any jurisdiction over sections 16 and 36 which passed to the State by the admission act, except the legislature of Idaho and the State land board, and those tribunals can only exercise the power over said lands within the limitations of the constitution of Idaho. The Government of the United States, however desirable you may consider such action, can not include the State's school sections in the forest reserves or exercise any jurisdiction over them. In my judgment it is well for the State that this is true.

Lum convinced that Lam acting in the best interests of the States.

the State's school sections in the forest reserves or exercise any jurisdiction over them. In my judgment it is well for the State that this is true.

I am convinced that I am acting in the best interests of the State's present and future in the course I am pursuing in this matter, and I believe that the people of Idaho, with few exceptions, will, when they understand the situation, agree with me, and will cooperate with me in any effort on my part, or on that of others, to preserve these lands to the State. If private lumber companies, scrip locators, or lieu-land selectors have laid a hand upon any of the school sections of the State, they have done so in violation of the law, and there is but one plain duty resting upon the executive officers of the State, and that is to institute proceedings to recover any loss which the State may have suffered by reason of the cutting of timber upon these sections, and to dispossess any persons, whether it be those claiming under the railroad land grants, stone and timber selections, homestead selections, or any other class of claim. If the State officers do less than this they fail in their duty. I am justified in believing from the information which I have received that the State has already been damaged to a very large extent by the cutting of timber upon school sections, which have been attempted to be taken up since the admission of the State, under various claims of title, and the matter is so serious that the legislature should investigate this question at the earliest possible date. Every school section the title to which passed under the admission act should be taken up, identified, and an abstract of title made of it, and the facts as to its possession or any adverse claim made to it ascertained and the State's rights fully protected in the matter.

The rights of the State involved in the foregoing consideration amount to many millions of dollars, and the sooner the questions of sentiment in regard thereto are laid aside and the Questions of the State's legal rig rights taken up the better will the people be served and their rights protected.

I have not undertaken to discuss the State's rights to a free and untrammeled field for selecting such lands as it is entitled to select in lieu of other lands, or under its general right to select lands for the several purposes enumerated in the admission act, as I do not desire to confuse the two classes of lands. I will only say, in leaving this question for the present, that the State was granted large areas of land subject to selection, the title to which rests upon an entirely different basis from that of sections 16 and 36. and which do not pass until such selection is made and approved. These selections only being available upon surveyed lands, I propose to attempt to obtain a very much larger appropriation for the survey of Idaho lands, in order that the field of selection may be available within which the State may exercise the right to this second class of lands.

Bear in mind that the State can not give title by consent, nor can it waive its rights to these lands. It can not trade them away or dispose of them other than as provided by the constitution of the State.

Government is not a question of policy, but it is a question of law. The laws are made pursuant to the policy of the people, but until the policy is enacted into law it is not controlling in determining the rights of either the Government or the people.

You speak of the proposed amendments to the land laws as promising new conditions. The proposed amendments are not to be considered in interpreting the existing laws and could in no way affect existing titles to lands.

I have written you this letter for the purpose of presenting the legal to lands.

I have written you this letter for the purpose of presenting the legal phase of this question, robbed of any sentiment or theory, irrespective of whether it is in accord with the "policy" of the Administration or not, and I shall from time to time present some further consideration of this question, and other phases of the forest-reserve question as it affects the interests of the State of Idaho, to you for such use as you may see fit to make of it, and shall at the same time present such views to the people of the State through the most available medium.

Very respectfully, yours,

W. B. Heyburn.

W. B. HEYBURN.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will ask the Senator from Idaho to kindly repeat his request as to the printing of a

Mr. HEYBURN. I have requested that the map, a copy of which I have sent to the desk, may be incorporated in the RECORD. It was done on a former occasion in the discussion of this matter, and it will not be very expensive.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that it may take some days to reproduce the map.

Mr. HEYBURN. The matter was not delayed before. Printing Office still have the plates, which they can easily adjust in this instance.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Idaho? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I am in entire sympathy with the purpose which my colleagues have in view, and that is the development of the West. In the thirteen States and two Territories in which the main part of the remaining public domain lies the problems relating to it are of the highest impor-The title to the public domain is in the Government of the United States and is held in trust not for the particular States in which the lands are located, but for the entire people of the United States, wherever resident, for the creation of homes by home seekers and the prosperity and advantage of the teeming population of the future. The people of the Western States do not claim that these lands belong to them; but they do claim that they should be administered in the interest of those Western States with a due regard to the interest of the entire people of the United States; and of course it is in the interest of the entire people that all the Western States should be fully developed, that they should be increased in population and in wealth and in prosperity and happiness.

The land laws under which these lands are being settled are numerous. They have been the creation of many years. twenty years or more the Executive Department charged with the execution of these laws has been insisting upon it that the laws themselves should be modified and changed in order to meet the interests of the people of the United States and the interests of the people of the West. They have insisted that they were inadequate to the economic requirements of the West, and that being unsuited to the economic requirements they were oftentimes evaded in order to meet them. I take it for granted that wherever a law exists upon the statute book applicable to any particular region that is not suited to the economic requirements of its people they will always evade it.

This contest has been going on for years between the executive department and the legislative department of the Govern-Secretary of the Interior after Secretary of the Interior has called attention to the defects in these laws; Commissioner of the General Land Office after Commissioner of the General Land Office has called attention to the defects in these laws; and yet few changes have been made. Congress has been either inert or it has been so divided in judgment upon the questions proposed as to be unable to act.

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

We now have as the head of the executive department of the Government a man who is probably as familiar with the requirements of the West and with the public domain as any President who has sat in the Presidential chair for many years. He is and has been the friend of the West. We have in the Interior Department a Secretary of the Interior who is and has been the friend of the West, and every act which he has done with reference to this very great public domain has been with a view to the promotion of the interests of the West. He has been zealous in the protection of the public domain, realizing its great value to the home seekers; he has been opposed to its absorption by monopolists and speculators. I believe thoroughly in the sincerity of his motives and the value of his service. I believe that his main purpose has been to preserve this great public domain for the home seekers; that his main idea has been the creation of homes and not of great monopolistic holdings, promotive of oppression and extortion. I can not forget his valuable aid to the cause of national irrigation, extended from the very commencement of his service and demonstrated on numerous occasions in his public reports.

I have recently looked over the utterances of the Secretary of the Interior in his annual reports, and I have found that uniformly his text is the preservation of the public domain for actual home seekers. I therefore am not inclined to sympathize or to agree with some of the utterances that have been made upon this floor, which charged the Secretary of the Interior with a malevolent purpose toward the West. I believe that his purpose has been patriotic and helpful to the West.

Nor do I think it fair to fix upon the Secretary of the Interior the entire responsibility for this order of the President under which he is acting and of which many western Senators complain and to exempt the President. We all know that there is a strong, forceful man in the White House; that the question of forestry, the question of irrigation, and the question of homes for home seekers—all these questions have been to him the subject of thought and reflection for years. He is not an uninformed man who would listen to the suggestions of a malevolent Secretary of the Interior and carry out his views instead of his own. If there has been an order made regarding these matters by the President of the United States, I believe him to be familiar with all the facts, and I believe that he has exercised his best judgment upon those facts. If the order is wrong, I believe in holding him responsible for it and not charging the responsibility upon the Secretary of the Interior, who, after five or six years of faithful service, is now going out of the service of the Government.

THE LAND LAWS-HOMESTEADS.

Mr. President, what are these land laws? They relate principally to the entry of homesteads for home seekers, to the entry of timber lands, to the entry of coal lands, to the entry of mineral lands, to the entry of desert lands. The homestead act was passed fifty or sixty years ago. Its operation has been most beneficent in all the humid States of the Union. The entryman was compelled to take a solemn oath that he had entered the land for himself and not for anyone else, either directly or indirectly. His oath states:

That his application is honestly and in good faith made for the purpose of actual settlement and cultivation, and not for the benefit of any other person, persons, or corporation, and that he will faithfully and honestly endeavor to comply with all the requirements of law as to settlement, residence, and cultivation necessary to acquire title to the land applied for; that he is not acting as agent of any person, corporation, or syndicate in making such entry, nor in collusion with any person, corporation, or syndicate to give them the benefit of the land entered, or any part thereof, or the timber thereon; that he does not apply to enter the same for the purpose of speculation, but in good faith, to obtain a home for himself, and that he has not, directly or indirectly, made and will not make any agreement or contract in any way or manner, with any person or persons, corporation, or syndicate whatsoever, by which the title which he might acquire from the Government of the United States should inure, in whole or in part, to the benefit of any person except himself.

And this was the spirit of almost all the laws relating to the

And this was the spirit of almost all the laws relating to the lands of the United States. The intention of Congress was clear that an entryman should make an entry for himself, and not for another, and that these lands, granted so freely by the Government to its citizens, should not in future be concentrated in large areas, and thus establish monopoly either in the lands themselves or in the minerals which they contain.

The homestead law operated beneficently, and why? In early days there was no commutation clause. It was not until 1891, if my recollection is right, that commutation was allowed.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President—
The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. CARTER. The so-called commutation clause in the homestead law was passed long prior to 1891. As originally passed, it required only six months' residence upon the claim prior to the time the person could commute, pay cash, and procure title. In the revision of these laws, which occurred in 1891, the period of residence was extended to two years. So that as early as 1891 a person desiring to commute must show a residence upon the claim of two years, while six months was the original period.

Mr. NEWLANDS. My impression was that the act of 1891 required a residence of only fourteen months, and of that fourteen months the residence for the first six months was not required to be actual, but was constructive.

Mr. CARTER. I am informed that fourteen months is the present requirement of the statute.

Mr. NEWLANDS. At all events, as I understand, the homestead law as originally framed did not provide for commutation; and under the homestead law the great States of the Mississippi Valley were settled up, and there was little or no concentration land there. Farms were 160 acres in area, as a rule.
Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit an of land there.

interruption-

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

CARTER. The largest farming area ever concentrated in single ownership in this country was in the great State of Illinois. It was known as the Sullivan farm. That great farm in operation proved a distinct failure, and the large holding was subdivided. I believe now there is not in what was originally the great Sullivan farm in the vicinity Bloomington, Ill., a single ownership exceeding 160 acres.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the Senator state under what law the 300,000 acres to which he refers were acquired?

Mr. CARTER. The land title was acquired to some extent, I think, from the Illinois Central Railroad grant; to another extent under the old cash-entry system, which obtained prior to 1862, and a portion of it under the homestead act, which was passed in 1862

Mr. NEWLANDS. Does the Senator know how large a portion of it was acquired under the homestead act?

I have not inquired into the exact details, Mr. CARTER. but the title to the Sullivan farm was acquired, I think, under all the laws to which I have referred.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I think the Senator will find that most of that great farm was acquired by and under those provisions of law that existed before the homestead act, which provided for grants to railroads and for the sale of public lands in almost unlimited areas

Mr. CARTER. As to that I am unable to speak. sponse was to the general proposition the Senator set forth—that in the old or so-called humid States large aggregations of lands never obtained. Large farms, I think, were chiefly obtained under what is known as the cash-entry system, which preceded the homestead act of 1862.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Under that system very large areas of land could be purchased from the Government. I believe there was no limit at that time to the land that could be acquired by direct purchase from the Government.

Mr. CARTER. I think the sales were made in 160-acre tracts, but there was no limit as to the amount any one individual It was a question of payment in cash. At that time the Government sought exclusively to gain revenue from the lands. The homestead act marked a departure in the interest of the actual settler.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator is mistaken in understanding that I said there was no concentration of lands whatever in the Mississippi Valley and in the humid region.

Mr. CARTER. I stand corrected, then. I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. NEWLANDS. What I did say was that, as the result of the homestead act, that entire region was settled up by actual settlers; that, as a rule, the farms were small farms and that there was little or no concentration of land in large holdings.

THE ARID REGION.

Mr. President, the homestead law was suited to that region, but as the lands of the humid region were settled up we had before us the arid and semiarid lands of the intermountain There larger areas were required in order to make They were required mainly for cattle ranges. impossible for a man who wanted to raise cattle to conduct his operations on a range of only 160 acres. In order to properly graze them, it was necessary to control the water of the range; and so a gradual system of evasion of the homestead law grew out of the necessity of the case. The owner of a large range, finding it incumbent upon him to protect it from invasion by securing the water that might be on it, called upon his rangemen, his vaqueros, to enter lands here and there containing the sources of water supply, and gradually throughout that entire region it was regarded as a legitimate exercise of the privileges under the homestead act to make entries of that kind.

About a year ago I met a man from the East who had a large range in that region—a man largely identified with reform in politics in the United States, a strong friend of the President, and in sympathy with him in his policies and measures. He told me he had this range. I asked him how he had concentrated so large an area in one holding, and he went on to tell me very innocently that the men in his employ had entered lands here and there and had conveyed them to him and had thus enabled him to round out and perfect the control of his range. He was unconscious that this was done in violation or evasion of the law. He is probably approving to-day the many convictions that have been had throughout the entire western region under laws which western men were absolutely compelled to evade in order to conduct their business.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President—
The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from North Dakota? Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. In what part of the country is that land located?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I would prefer not to locate either the land or the man.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Well, the Senator can give me approximately the location by telling me in what State or Territory the land is located?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I would prefer not to.
Mr. HANSBROUGH. I will say, Mr. President, that no such thing as the Senator from Nevada has described can take place in the State of North Dakota where the lands are valuable, and where men put on the lands for the purposes indicated by the Senator would find that their entries would be contested at That is always the case wherever the lands are valuable.

Mr. NEWLANDS. But how about lands that are not so valuable, and where the custom of the range prevails? I will state to the Senator that the State of North Dakota should be classed generally as a humid State. There are certain areas, of course, in that State that are semiarid; but, as a rule, it is a humid State. Therefore, the homestead law is adapted to its requirements, and there has been a great deal of development there of small homes

Mr. HANSBROUGH. And yet, notwithstanding the admission made by the Senator, the public lands commission, appointed by the President, and who went to my State for a few days, made a very extravagant report in regard to the extent of the frauds in that State.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state, Mr. President, that there is not the same economic reason for the evasion of the land laws in the State of North Dakota as there is in the semiarid States of the country, but I am inclined to believe that there have been many evasions of the law there that were not compelled by economics.

I believe that the commutation clause of the homestead act has in many parts of North Dakota been used to defeat the purpose of that act. I am told that there are land companies organized there that advance to the man who enters under the homestead act the money necessary to make his entry and to make the cultivation that is required, etc., to comply with the act, and that by the wholesale these lands, after the expiration of fourteen months, are transferred to these land companies, and that thus speculative holding of large areas of land has been The homestead act does not contemplate speculation, but home building.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Does the Senator from Nevada claim that such a thing takes place in the State of North Dakota?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not know it of my own personal knowledge

Mr. HANSBROUGH. If the Senator makes a claim of that kind I want to say that he is entirely mistaken. The records will show that throughout the State of North Dakota almost every quarter section of land has a settler upon it, and those settlers are to-day living there in the snow 2 and 3 feet deep in order to perfect their residence and prevent contests against

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the Senator deny that in the State of North Dakota there are many farms of from 1,000 to 5,000 acres in area?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, in parts of the State of North Dakota, especially in regions where there were land grants and where men in former years took advantage of the opportunity to acquire land under those land grants there are farms of from one to five thousand acres; but, outside of those land-grant areas nothing of the kind described by the Senator takes place, nor can it take place.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the Senator insist that outside of those land-grant areas there are not also farms of very much greater extent than 160 acres?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Oh, yes, Mr. President, there are many farms outside of the land-grant areas of 500 acres and over, and some of a thousand acres, I do not doubt.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And some of two or three thousand acres? Mr. HANSBROUGH. But they were not acquired illegitimately. They were acquired precisely as the Senator would acquire land if he were there in the land business. If he himself had settled upon a homestead in the earlier days and had profited thereby, making a little money from year to year, he would have invested his profits in an adjoining quarter section of land, and he would have had the right to do that without any evasion of the land laws.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I have no personal information upon the subject, but I understand the condition to which I have referred largely exists in some portions of North Dakota and that farming entries are made under the homestead act by people who are not farmers-by school-teachers, by clerks, and by others either residing in the community or residing far away-that they reside there apparently for fourteen months, six months of the residence being merely constructive, under the requirements of the Land Office, and eight months only of actual residence being assured, and that at the end of fourteen months in very many cases these people, who had sworn that they entered the lands simply for themselves and not for others, got title to the land and then immediately transferred it to the great land companies which have advanced them their expenses meanwhile, and that there is a considerable speculation in these lands in that way.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President-

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I have no doubt there are some isolated cases similar to the case the Senator describes; but I will say to the Senator that that is not the rule in the State of North Dakota or any place else on the public domain where lands are valuable.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not contend that it is the rule. have no doubt it is the exception. But it is the duty of the President, charged with the execution of the law, to see that these exceptions do not occur, and it is the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to see that these exceptions do not occur.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President-

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Minnesota?
Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. Without any criticism and without desiring to press any advantage, I suggest to the Senator, speaking of duty, that if he knows of the case where this ranch was taken up by these improper methods, whether it does not rise almost to the dignity of a duty to place the facts before some one who can investigate the case?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have already stated to the Senator that I know nothing of personal knowledge regarding North Dakota.
Mr. CLAPP. But the Senator stated that a gentleman told him that he himself had done it, as I understood, and when the Senator from North Dakota asked where the land was located the Senator felt that he was not obliged to state where it was. It was certainly a violation of the law.

Mr. NEWLANDS. All I can say is that the Senator must have a very poor opinion of me if he thinks I would take advantage of a private conversation with a gentleman who made so naïve and innocent a confession under the conditions stated.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I think the Senator from Nevada should state whether this transaction took place in the State of North Dakota.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Every other Senator then might ask me the same question with respect to his State, and in the end you would locate the State in which the transaction took place.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I am satisfied that it did not take place in the State of North Dakota. I think the Senator knows that, too.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am not making any special charge against the State of North Dakota.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President—

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. I rose to remark that I am somewhat charmed by the use of the word "innocent" in reference to the gentle-. man's transaction in acquiring the public domain under the circumstances the Senator stated.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I repeat it. The gentleman was entirely innocent in the transaction. He did not know what the law was. He turned the matter over to his agents and accumulated

I can recall myself that many years ago, when I was practicing law, I went to look at a large cattle range which an English friend was thinking of purchasing, consisting of a large number of cattle and a very wide range of land; and I went over the range, talked with the vaqueros and the superintendents and the foremen, and they were all talking about the manner in which they were completing the title to that range. found that every one of them made some entry, most of them under the homestead act, and they were making these entries simply in the interest of the owner of the range. It was so much the custom of that part of the country that they did not realize that they were offending against the law.

MISFIT LAWS.

I am making no charge against the State of North Dakota. These conditions prevail in every one of the Western States, and I insist upon it that they prevail because the Congress has never yet shaped the laws so as to suit the economic requirements of the country, and such laws will always be evaded; and I insist upon it that the fault is largely with Congress. As it is, we have laws inadequate to the development of the West. and the West must grow, law or no law, and will grow, law or no law; and I insist upon it that it is much better for us to change the laws so as to meet the economic requirements of the West than to let the present conditions remain under which the President, sworn to execute the law, is landing men in jail who at heart and judged by their environment are as innocent of any intentional wrong as the gentleman who gave his account to me of the manner in which he accumulated a control of a large area of land. It makes me heartsick to read here of clergymen and others being indicted in the West for making entries under the land laws, without any conception of the guilt involved in the act.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President-

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER. The Senator states that the economic conditions in the country referred to are such that the 160-acre homestead claim is wholly inadequate to meet the conditions.

Would he so amend the law as to permit of the acquisition of a much larger area of land by a single individual?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am not prepared to state now what changes I would favor. That would be a digression from my present purpose. What I do insist upon is that it is the duty of the Senators and Representatives from the West, more familiar with these conditions and who are familiar with the laws, to get together and recommend to the Congress of the United States laws that will meet these conditions. I should expect in such a conference to give and take, to accommodate my views in many particulars to the views of my associates with the purpose of securing harmony of action. I would expect that we would arrive at a pretty nearly unanimous conclusion, and I believe that our recommendations to the Public Lands Committee of the Senate and the Public Lands Committee of the House would be crystallized in legislation within six months

We had the same experience with the irrigation question. The men of the West had been engaged for years in educating Congress upon the subject of irrigation, in educating the humid region as to the requirements of the arid region. They were not only educating the Congress, but educating the country at the same time, and when the public sentiment of the entire country was ripe for action we found that we differed among ourselves as to the kind of law that should be passed, and we were in danger of making a spectacle of ourselves in Congress and before the country and of defeating the entire movement by the divergence of our views.

Some were in favor of nationalizing irrigation. Some were in favor of confining it to State lines. Some were in favor of the cession of all of the arid lands to the States. Some were in favor of giving the States the absolute control over the waters stored by national action. But as the result of this divergence of views we concluded to come together, and we met and appointed a committee from thirteen States and three Territories, consisting of one Senator and one Representative from each State, and that committee appointed a subcommittee of seventeen, and the subcommittee held sessions consecutively for thirty days. At the end of that time the committee of seventeen reached a unanimous conclusion, and they presented their conclusion to the general committee, and it was adopted after much discussion. Then it was submitted to the committee of the Senate and of the House, approved in almost all its features by them, and within a few months afterward was triumphantly passed by Congress.

That law has given universal satisfaction and will give still greater satisfaction, and the Western Senators and Representa-tives took the very position which Mr. Hitchcock and Mr. Roosevelt have always contended for and do now contend for, that not only the reclamation act, but all the land laws should be administered in the interest of home seekers and with a view to preventing monopoly.

LAND MONOPOLY.

The purpose of Congress has been honest throughout the entire history of our legislation upon this subject. Look at every one of the statutes relating to public lands and you will see the purpose clearly is to avoid land monopoly, and yet we know that under these very laws monopoly has been built up in the West.

We know that in the State of Colorado the Colorado Iron and Fuel Company is in control of almost all the available coal fields of that State. We know that it has become a great power industrially and politically. We know of the methods by which it has obtained favored transportation. We know how strong a factor it has been in politics and how potential it has been in controlling the State, and yet if you survey all the lands that are in the ownership of this corporation to-day and which constitute its wealth and give it so great a political influence and strength, you will find that thirty years ago every acre of those lands belonged to the people of the United States

We know that under the land laws of the United States large areas of land have been concentrated in the arid region and on the Pacific coast. We know that in the San Joaquin Valley one ranch of 300,000 acres was concentrated under these laws. We know that there is one firm in California that owns over a million acres, of which the larger proportion was the property of the entire people twenty-five or thirty years ago.

Now, these are the conditions that exist. Congress never intended that they should exist. Congress intended.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President—
The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.
Mr. PERKINS. I merely wish to remind my friend the Senator from Nevada that these large areas in California were, as he is aware, principally Spanish grants of land, and when California was admitted into the Union those titles were recognized. It is a curse to the State, I admit, but it is not due to the land laws of our own country.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator states that these great ranches are a curse to the State, and in that sentence he recognizes the evil of land monopoly, which Congress has always intended to avert, but which it has failed to avert.

It is true, as the Senator says, that many of these ranches consisted of grants made by the Mexican Government, and that the rights were vested and that the United States Government was compelled to recognize them, notwithstanding the fact that they have arrested and delayed the economic development of that State. But in the two instances that I speak of, where there have been these concentrations of lands, only twenty or twenty-five years ago the land belonged to the Government of the United States. I can point the Senator to numerous ranches there of very large extent-from fifty to a hundred thousand acres—that consisted originally of Government land, and I believed that the bulk of the land held by this great firm of which I speak was originally Government land.

THE TIMBER MONOPOLY.

Now, we also know that the timber lands are being concentrated in very large areas.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President-

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.
Mr. HEYBURN. Before leaving the question of the homestead lands, I would inquire of the Senator whether or not the fact that these large areas exist because of some violation of the law in the past, perhaps, would be any justification for suspending the entry of valid homesteads at this time, as by the order set forth?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not feel called upon to defend the order made by the President. I am not sufficiently well informed to form a judgment regarding it. What I do know is that it is his duty to execute the law, and that his duty is not to turn over to any man lands that have been fraudulently acquired, and it is his duty to see to it that every precaution is taken against fraudulent entry and fraudulent patenting, and Congress has authorized him to make the rules and regulations necessary to carry out the intent and spirit of the land laws. I am prepared to give him the aid necessary to accomplish this. I deplore the tying up of the patents as much as anyone, but I think this difficulty will be best solved by cooperation between Congress and the President in securing good administration and good laws, rather than by an unnecessary antagonism.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to ask the Senator what law is being executed by the President in suspending the entries of public lands by homesteaders who are not charged with fraud?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I may say that the duty devolves upon the President, upon the Executive Department, of segregating the fraudulent from the honest, and that that necessarily means some kind of an examination under the law.

Mr. HEYBURN. But what law is he executing in suspending

Mr. Historia. But hat have been examined, passed upon, and approved and only await delivery of patent? What law is he executing?

Mr. NEWLANDS. As I stated, I am not prepared to defend the order of the President—it may have gone entirely too far; I think it has in many particulars—but I do say that the purpose which has animated him has doubtless been that of the faithful execution of the laws in their spirit and their intent, and I also contend that Congress has been at fault in not providing laws that are suited to the requirements of this region, which is entirely different from the humid region which was First settled up.

Now, as to timber lands, we all know that there have been large concentrations of ownership in timber lands in the West, and with reference to that I have another illustration in the naïve confession of a man interested in entering up timber I was a member of the El Paso Irrigation Congress and on the committee on resolutions when the question came up there as to what the policy of the West should be regarding the land laws. We had under consideration the timber act. There was a gentleman there from the State of Minnesota, whose name I can not recall and whose name I would not give if I could recall it. He stated in that committee that he had started in life as a poor boy and that he could now write his check for $500,000, and that his money had been made entirely in the lumber business. He insisted upon it that these lands ought not to be held by the Government unutilized; that it was to the interest of the entire people that they should be so divided up and sold as soon as possible, and he went on to say how beneficial the sale of timber lands had been to different people that he knew. He instanced the fact that from his own State many clerks and school-teachers, male and female, had gone out to the West and, under these laws, had entered timber lands, and that each one of them had made $500 or $600 upon He seemed to be entirely unconscious of the the transaction. fact that in making these entries of timber lands and turning the lands over to corporations and syndicates for profit they were violating and evading the law, and he asked us whether we ought to prevent these good, honest people from making a little money in that way. He was entirely unconscious, apparently-doubtless he had been in the same transactions himself, for his entire conversation indicated it—that there was any moral offense in the matter, and yet the very people of whom he spoke and people like them are doubtless subject to punishment under the law.

The timber laws are absolutely unsuited to the requirements of the West. We all know that in order to establish the lumber business it is necessary to have large capital; that you must have large saw and planing mills; that you must build railroads; that you must construct wagon roads. In many cases these en-terprises, in order to produce lumber at a reasonable price, require a capitalization of from $1,000,000 to $2,000,000, and yet our law restricts a man to the entry of 160 acres, and assumes that the entire lumber business of the country can be conducted by numerous people, each one of them owning only 160 acres. Clearly, in order to meet the economic requirements of the lumber situation, it is incumbent upon us either to provide that these lands can be sold in larger areas or to recognize that the best way of managing the lands is to hold them in communal form, selling only the stumpage and giving everybody an equal chance to purchase the timber upon the land.

In the latter way we could, if extortion or monopoly prevailed, control the prices of the product, and we must admit that if consolidation takes place to such an extent as to make competition impossible in any product, in the end it is the duty of the Government itself to fix the price of that product; that whenever competition becomes impossible it is the right and it is the duty of the Government to fix the price.

So we have here a condition absolutely unsuited to the requirements of the entire country. We have here a condition where the laws are being evaded and where vast lumber companies have been organized, which have employed people to enter these timber lands, not for their own individual use, but for monopolistic use, and when the entry was complete and the title obtained, the corporations themselves have secured the title. We have built up in the West the great lumber trust of which the Senator from South Dakota complained in his admirable speech the other The whole tendency of the law as it now stands upon the statute books is toward the promotion of fraud and perjury and the creation of monopoly.

I ask, when these conditions exist and when the Secretary of the Interior and the President of the United States are making an effort by the administration of the law to break up the existing condition of things, whether it is not very much better for us, instead of attacking them for perhaps overzeal in the administration of the law, to show some speed in reforming the law.

We alone can do that.

PERCENTAGE OF FRAUD.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to ask the Senator whether it would not be more correct to say "in an effort to fail to execute the law?" Is not the effort rather to avoid executing the law than to execute it when it stops its execution entirely?

Then I should like to remark to the Senator that it is rather a strong indictment of the American people to suggest, as his remarks might possibly be held to suggest, that all of these entries of timber lands were tainted with fraud. Is it not probable that the percentage of fraud is very slight and that a great many people honestly and earnestly seek to comply with the law?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am not aware that I have insisted that all these entries were fraudulent.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator did not make any exception. Mr. NEWLANDS. On the other hand, I did not state that all of these entries were fraudulent, nor do I so contend.

Mr. HEYBURN. Less than 1 per cent have been found to be illegal.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Let us inquire into that 1 per cent. The Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] touched with great force upon that. He showed from the records that of all the numerous entries that had been made less than 1 per cent, I believe, had been canceled, and he assumed, therefore, that that 1 per cent was all that ought to have been canceled. That is not a fair assumption. If, as the President and the Secretary of the Interior insist, they have not, under existing law, a sufficient force of men to discover and make apparent the frauds which they have reason to believe exist, then it is very clear that if we do not furnish them with the agents and with the machinery to detect these evasions and violations of the law the number of actual cancellations of patents that are made does not show necessarily the sum total of the frauds or evasions that have been perpetrated.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President—
The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly. Mr. CARTER. I merely rise to suggest to the Senator that the Interior Department, on its estimates, has been provided by the Congress with appropriations for the supervision of these land entries for a number of years gone by, and that if the Department needed more money it simply failed to call for the sum it needed. Congress has responded by appropriations equivalent to the estimates.

Before resuming my seat I wish to call the Senator's attention to another state of facts. He suggests that in the Northwestern country a great lumber trust has grown up. I have no doubt that is true. But it originated only to an inconsiderable extent through individual effort. The great railway land grants, embracing large areas of timber land, supplemented by what is known as the "lieu-land scrip" under the act of 1897, eventuated in these great consolidated holdings. I call the attention of the Senator further to the fact that the predecessor of the present Secretary held that the act of 1897, relative to the selection of lieu lands, did not apply to landgrant railway companies.

The Land Office force, I am informed, contended likewise for that construction. But they were both arbitrarily overruled, and over 2,000,000 acres of timber lands were passed to these monopolistic holdings under the rulings of the present Secretary, under the guise of lieu land selected, or land taken in lieu of other lands embraced in forest reservations.

Another strange fact is that when Congress finally determined to repeal that law, the Secretary of the Interior insisted upon preserving the integrity of a contract he had made without any rhyme or reason, without any requirement of law, whereby certain lands in what is known as the "San Francisco Forest Reserve," in the Territory of Arizona, were made the basis of these lieu-land selections, with the remarkable provision in the contract that the railroad company in its grant of land could first cut off all the timber on the base lands proposed to be incorporated in the forest reserve, and might then take of the virgin forests in the State of Idaho lieu land for the land they had stripped of the timber under the contract with the Secretary in the Territory of Arizona. By and through the original land grant and the lieu-land scrip held by the Secretary to be applicable to the-land-grant railways, great consolidated holdings, now the basis of the lumber trust of the Northwest, were permitted, and I do protest against charging that kind of an operation to individuals honestly engaged in attempting to acquire title to public lands under the laws of the Government.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I am, of course, prepared to admit that a very large proportion of the concentration of the timber land of the country is due to the land grants, and that a very large proportion is due to the lieu-land law to which the Senator refers. If that is so, it simply demonstrates that in the past the Congress of the United States in passing its laws and possibly the executive branch of the Government in administering them have been very prodigal of the public domain.

But if that is true, it is all the more incumbent upon us not to be so prodigal now, when two-thirds of the public domain is exhausted and the portion in the arid and semiarid region alone remains. That country is capable of supporting a hundred millions of people if we keep it for home seekers and keep it out of the hands of combinations and monopolies.

I am not prepared to answer what the Senator says regarding the administration by the Secretary of the Interior of the lieu-land law. If he held that the lieu-land law applied to railroad corporations, I have no doubt the opinion was honestly held, and I have no doubt it was given upon legal advice.

Mr. CARTER. I raise no question as to that. It is as to the result I speak.

Mr. NEWLANDS. But the lieu-land law was passed by Con-If there are any loopholes in the lieu-land law, Congress is responsible for it, and it only illustrates my argument that it is of the highest importance that we men of the West should settle this question amongst ourselves by appropriate legislation.

NO INDICTMENT OF THE WEST.

The Senator from Montana implies that I am indicting the honesty and the integrity of the West in what I have said. It is not so, Mr. President. I am only indicting the honesty and the integrity of a few men in the West and a few men in the East who aid in the evasion of the land laws in the West, and I am exceedingly charitable in my construction of their offenses. have insisted throughout that however we may feel upon the moral presentation of the case regarding the guilt or the innocence of a man who is charged with a certain offense, we must realize that if we pass laws which are unsuited to the economic requirements of the country, we must expect their evasion.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President-

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would suggest to the Senator from Nevada that the difficulty arises in a large measure out of the use of general terms. We have had at no time a statement as to either the men who have made fraudulent entries or the land that has been fraudulently entered. These statements have always come to us in the form of a general statement.

Now, how many individuals by name does the Senator suppose that we could have enumerated to us by the Secretary of the Interior, if we were to call for it by enumeration, who had taken up land fraudulently, either under the timber and stone act or under the homestead act? It would be interesting to ascertain how many tracts of land they would be willing to say had been entered in violation of law, and it would be interesting to ask of them the names of the individuals. Then we would be in a position to say to them, "Why do you not cancel these en-If they were obtained or entered in violation of the law, why does not the United States Government, instead of dealing in a general indictment against the whole country, particularize it so that we may separate those who are charged from those who are not?" Would it not be a very proper method of procedure to call upon the Department for a list of the fraudulent entries that had so impressed them as to cause them to suspend all entries?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I think it would be a very proper procedure on the part of Congress. I do not know whether Congress has ever taken that action or not. If it has not, it has been derelict.

Mr. HEYBURN. We are entitled to the names.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, it was my purpose to have read some extracts from the reports of the Secretary of the Interior showing that throughout he has had the purpose only of the equal and harmonious development of the West, with equal rights to all and special privileges to none, and with a view to promoting the development of the West for the homes of home seekers. I will ask leave to insert those excerpts in my remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

THE COAL LANDS.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Now, Mr. President, regarding the coal lands, we know that almost all the coal lands of Pennsylvania have fallen under one control. We know that almost all the coal lands of West Virginia have fallen under one control. know that almost all the coal lands of Colorado have fallen under one control. I ask: Is it not incumbent upon us to take up that question and see to it that the fuel supply of the great Western region is not in any way monopolized?

The suggestion is made by the President that we should provide for leasing these lands, at the same time disposing of the surface in some way so that it could be used for agricultural That is one solution. It is a solution that I have been inclined to favor, and at the last session of Congress I introduced a bill upon the subject, a copy of which I shall insert in my remarks. The bill is as follows:

A bill (S. 5441) authorizing the President to reserve coal and lignite underlying public lands for future disposal.

underlying public lands for future disposal.

Be it enacted, ctc. That the President of the United States may, from time to time, set aside and reserve in any State or Territory having public lands underlaid by beds of coal or lignite of commercial value such areas as, in his judgment, should be held for future disposal of the coal or lignite. And the President shall by public proclamation declare the establishment of such reservations and the limits thereof. The title to and the right to the use of the surface of such land may be disposed of in accordance with existing law; all conveyances of title, however, from the United States shall contain the provision that the coal or lignite underlying said land is reserved for the use of the United States, together with such rights of way as may be necessary for the mining and removal of the coal or lignite, in accordance with commercial usages; such reservations shall be put under the control of the Geological Survey of the Interior Department, and the Secretary of the Interior shall report to the Congress his recommendation regarding the best method of disposing of such coal and lignite with a view to preventing monopoly and extortionate prices.

Another solution is in granting these lands to provide plainly against their concentration hereafter in monopolistic holdings.

But whatever our view may be as to whether those lands

But whatever our view may be as to whether those lands should be held in a communal form for the entire future, the Government leasing them, fixing a moderate royalty for the extraction of coal, and maintaining a control over the price so as to prevent monopoly, or whether they should be sold and granted as heretofore to individuals under restrictions against monopoly, we must admit that the present laws are entirely inadequate.

In coal development, just as in timber development, it is essential to hold the control of a considerable area of land, in the interest of the public as well as the promoter of the project. Every coal enterprise involves an expenditure of a large sum of money, if it is conducted in such a way as to produce the coal as cheaply as possible. You must locate a town, you must build a town, you must provide waterworks and gas electric works. You must provide houses for the laborers, for the development of a coal mine on a western prairie means town development as well as mine development. It is absolutely essential, therefore, that an expenditure of large sums must be made.

Now, assume that we are going to intrust the development of our coal region to individual enterprise. Can we expect to enlist capital in the sums required under the present law, which permits an individual to take up only 160 acres? If we hold on to our present system we must increase the area of entry, and in order to do that we must change the law. I ask whether it is not a great deal better for us to address ourselves to changing the law, adopting either the communal system of leasing or the individual system of large holdings, with restrictions upon monopoly, if possible, than to be arraigning constantly the Secretary of the Interior and the President of the United States for attempting to enforce existing laws and to prevent the accumulation in one holding of a large area of land, which, whilst entirely desirable, is forbidden by the existing law the President is sworn to execute?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President—
The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.
Mr. HEYBURN. The suggestion of the Senator from Nevada characterizing the discussion that has taken place as an arraignment of the President or the Secretary hardly states the character of the discussion correctly. The discussion has not been in the nature of an arraignment of the President or Secretary. It has been a reply to an official message sent to this body by the President, in which, instead of the Senate having gone out to hunt a controversy, it is merely meeting one that was sent in here. It is not the question of the manner of the execution of the law that we have been discussing, but it is the question of the refusal to execute the law that we have been discussing

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not wish to characterize in any offensive way the very eloquent presentation of this matter that has been made by the Senator from Idaho and the Senator from Montana, but I thought in using the word "arraignment" I was using a very mild term as expressive of their utterances upon this floor.

THE FOREST RESERVES.

Mr. President, regarding the forest reserves, the Senator from Idaho complains of these reserves, and I must confess that his statement rather staggered me, that nearly one-third, I believe, of the entire area of his State had been taken up in forest reserves. I can understand how a State would watch with some apprehension the withdrawal from entry or the opportunity of private ownership of so large an area of the State.

It is possible that too large an area has been reserved; but so far as the general policy of the forest reserves is concerned I am satisfied that not only the people of the country sustain it, but that the people of the West sustain it. I think that the Senator, if he polls his own State regarding it, will find that the great majority are in favor of this policy of forest reserves.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President-

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield further to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.
Mr. HEYBURN. In reply I will say that I have no hesitation at all in stating for either the present or the future responsibility as to the fact being proved to be true, that 90 per cent of the people of Idaho are opposed absolutely and unqualifieldy to the forest-reserve policy which has resulted in with-drawing from the possibility of settlement 18,000,000 acres, or any considerable portion of it. I know the sentiment of that

Mr. NEWLANDS. I was speaking of the general policy.
Mr. NEWLANDS. I am speaking of the general policy.
Mr. NEWLANDS. I thought the Senator confined himself entirely to that particular exercise of policy.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, a few days ago the Live Stock Association of Idaho, in regular annual session, by a resolution in unqualified terms condemned the forestry policy of the Administration. They repeated it at Salt Lake, in the neighboring State. And they were looking at it from the standpoint of men who come most nearly having their interests along those lines.

GRAZING LANDS.

Mr. NEWLANDS: I know that the cattlemen of the West and the sheepmen of the West have been very much opposed to any interference at all by the Government with their use of the great grazing lands of the West, and they have resented any suggestion that the Government should in any way exercise control over its own lands in the interest of peace, the peace of the range, and in the interest of a proper development of the grazing resources of the lands. But I have found that there has been a great change of opinion among these men. I saw the other day a resolution adopted by, I think, the General Association of Cattlemen, looking to devising some system of control by the National Government. I am not sure whether it extended to an indorsement of the forestry system or not. My impression was that it did. But I am sure that it extended to this suggested system of control over the grazing lands.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President—
The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. My observation has been that the live-stock associations that have met of late have not declared opposition to the principle of the forest reserves, but they have taken exceptions to the large areas called "forest reserves" where they have included within their lines open parks not in the judgment of live-stock men necessary for forestry purposes, and in which live stock is prohibited from grazing or a smaller number are permitted within them than they believe should be allowed. Stockmen have also, in some instances, taken up the matter of the price charged and believe that it has been excessive, especially as to sheep. But I think generally the live-stock men recognize the necessity of taking care of the forests as such, wherever forests now exist or where young trees have started or will grow, but they require the use of the balance of the public domain and are taking exceptions to, first, the size of these reserves; second, the numbers of stock admitted, and, third, the price charged therefore, especially as to sheep. That is my

Mr. NEWLANDS. May I ask the Senator from Wyoming whether my statement is not correct, that the stockmen are gradually realizing the importance of the Government in some way controlling the range itself, recognizing the associations as factors in that control?

Mr. WARREN. I am very glad to reply to that. I have given it a good deal of attention, all the more so because I have been called upon of late to act in certain committees. here is the same condition as to live stock grazing on the public domain and the government thereof as prevailed a few years ago as to irrigation. There are so many different minds and so many different policies that it is unsafe, and it would be untrue to say that any definite, particular policy is that of the live-stock men.

In my State there are some that are opposed to any kind of control of the public domain, and especially so of the grazing On the other hand, there are a great many-and I will say that this number is composed usually of those who have been longest in business and who have had diversified stock, and who have provided food for their stock in winter, and who desire to use pastures—who are in favor of either the Government controlling or passing it to the State to control it, so that all the unoccupied grazing land may be sold or leased and parceled out amongst those who have the best right to use it. But there is,

Mr. NEWLANDS. Do they not recognize the fact that under the unrestrained use of these great areas for grazing

Mr. WARREN. I am coming to that.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The public peace is endangered for one and that the destruction of the grazing itself will be gradually assured?

Mr. WARREN. I am coming to that. The main objection that the live-stock men make to the Government controlling it absolutely is that those that will control it, if from headquarters here at Washington, will not exercise the same care and judgment in the division of the ranges and will not be as liberal in the rental as they think is necessary. Therefore they feel that there should be a local government, or at least a dual government of the land, composed partly of those at home on the ground and partly the General Government,

All stock men realize that the time is rapidly approaching when the limitless open-range business must cease, or when there must be some control, some partitioning up of the grazing lands not fit for settlement. And they all realize that as to Government property the Government has the undoubted right

The burning questions are, Has the time arrived for action, and how can the matter best be handled to benefit settlers, livestock men, and the Government, as the General Government is simply trustee for all the people?

Mr. NEWLANDS. They all recognize the fact that there must be some legislation upon the subject, but they differ as to the form of legislation, as I understand the Senator.

Mr. WARREN. Yes. There are many who believe that after certain time the remaining grazing lands should be sold. There are others who believe that they should be intrusted either to the State or to certain representatives of the State, or to a board in which the State has equal control with the General Government, that they may be rented subject to entry, and that the proceeds should be devoted to the furthering of the reclamation of the arid lands or the building of good roads, or to the bearing of some portion of the burden in the locality where they lie, instead of expecting that those who have title to their lands must pay all the taxes and the Government, in the control and ownership of a part of the land and through the unusual withholding of title to other lands, keep out from taxation a large proportion of the neighborhood property. They believe the proceeds, whatever they may be, of the public domain ought to be expended in the locality, or nearly so, where the land lies.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the remarks of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. Warren] simply illustrate my contention that there is not only need of legislation regarding these public lands, but there is a demand for it. There is a demand for it upon the part of those who have hitherto absolutely resisted any legislation—the men who have expected to use the public domain of the West as a vast common for the grazing of their cattle. They realize that this system results in constant contention between the varying interests of the cattlemen and the sheep men. resulting often in violence and in murder. They also realize that it involves a wasteful use of the public domain prejudicial to their own interest; that under the present system it is the interest of every man to crowd as many cattle upon the domain as possible, for if he does not crowd them his neighbor will. The result is that there will be too many cattle upon this domain, and they will be put upon the grass at times when it is unwise that the lands should be trodden by cattle. Every consideration of their own interest demands that there should be some adjustment by law of this question. It simply illustrates my contention that it is the duty of the men from the West to present a solution in the shape of a rational law.

I do not undertake to say now what that law should be. should imagine that the best temporary resting place possible would be to have some kind of leasing law, administered in connection and consultation with these cattle associations. gradual process of evolution we will work out a perfect system, either resulting in the communal holding of the lands or their gradual division and segregation into individual holdings, and always maintaining the right of the small farmer and home-seeker to enter and possess.

PROFITS OF ADMINISTRATION.

I think the contention of the West is a correct one—that these lands should not be administered for profit by the Government; that a certain proportion of the proceeds from the leasing should go into the local treasuries, with a view to local improvement. It is unfair to put the entire burden of taxation upon those who happen to have the legal title to their possessions. I think we should have this in view in our administration of the timber lands and the coal lands and the grazing lands; and whatever law we shape should provide for the assignment of a proper proportion of the proceeds realized to local government-municipal, county, and State.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President—

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. FULTON. I ask the Senator if he does not think that the entire proceeds from these lands, above the necessary cost of administering the law and taking care of them, should go to the States in which they are located?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I think so—either to them or to the irrigation fund or some other fund for western development.

Mr. FULTON. If these lands are to be held as forest reserves, or to be retained for leasing purposes, it will be withdrawing from the territory of the State a vast amount of land that can not pass into private ownership and therefore can not contribute in any way to the industrial life of the State. It is a very serious proposition to many of the Western States.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It undoubtedly is, and I think the question should be solved in that way.

Mr. President, I should be glad to go on in the consideration of these various laws and their imperfections and the necessity for their amendment, but I am admonished that the time for adjournment is near at hand, or has really passed, so I will only add a few words regarding the forest reserves.

While it may seem that this power has been exercised to a very prodigious extent in the State of Idaho, I have no doubt that, with a little patience, the whole system will work satis-factorily to the people of that State. If we can encourage there the spirit of cooperation instead of the spirit of resistance, I am sure that the forestry laws will be satisfactorily administered there, as they have been in the other States of the Union.

For my part I feel a pride in the great services of the National Government relating to the West; I feel a great pride in the Reclamation Service; I feel a great pride in the Forestry Service; I feel a great pride in the Geological Survey. I have attended most of the irrigation congresses that have been held in the West. They are held annually. Each consists usually of about a thousand members selected from representative men of all the States of that region. It has been the custom of the Forestry Service and the custom of the Reclamation Service to meet at these great congresses. They have held conventions of their own at the same time in the same place. They have adopted a system of exposition to the people of that region that has been exceedingly satisfactory to them. They have brought the people of that region into practical cooperation with them. They have listened to their suggestions, they have presented their plans, and they are no longer regarded as an invading army of impractical theorists determined to push their own views upon the West. I think we find universally that they have been possessed by the spirit of accommodation and of helpfulness. I believe in the end that the difficulties which the Senator from Idaho [Mr. Heyburn] seems to have encountered in his State will be entirely solved. I can understand how in making a reservation in the first instance it may be necessary to inclose some of the State lands; but certainly if the State lands have rights, the national lands also have rights. State lands happen to be entirely surrounded by national lands, I do not see that there is any great impropriety in the official who has control of the national lands requiring that a permit should be issued to the occupant of the State lands before allowing him to take his cattle over the forest lands. Proper administration of the forest land and protection against fire make this a reasonable requirement. It simply means order instead of chaos. Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator. would it not be more appropriate that the State, inasmuch as it is surrounded by national lands and being the government nearest at hand, should control the area that included both classes of land? Is it not probable that the State government, being on the ground, could more effectually conserve the interests of both the State and the nation inasmuch as their lands were equally within the area?

Mr. NEWLANDS. But, Mr. President, they are both sovereign. The State is sovereign over its lands, and the National Government is sovereign over its lands.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then, why should one sovereign, because it is larger than the other, absorb the small one?

Mr. NEWLANDS. It ought not to. Mr. HEYBURN. But it does.

Mr. NEWLANDS. There ought to be treaties between the two

Mr. HEYBURN. That is an old doctrine.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And negotiations in the spirit of accommodation and helpfulness; and I have no doubt that will be the case. But that is no argument against the general system of the forest reserves, and I think the Senator from Idaho will find that he stands almost alone in the Senate in his opposition to the general policy. I am not talking about a particular case, but his opposition to the general policy of forest reserves.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I have frequently been quoted as being in opposition to the general policy of forest reserves. I am not in opposition to the policy of forest reserves.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am glad to know that.
Mr. HEYBURN. But I am in opposition to the policy of forest reserves that transgress the rights of American citizens, individually or collectively.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I stand with the Senator there. satisfied that, with patience, we will work this whole thing out. The people of the West have naturally resented any national interference or control, but that control is being very wisely exercised, and I have no doubt in the end will meet with the satisfaction of all.

During the delivery of Mr. Newland's speech, Mr. CLAPP. I think, for the benefit of Senators, I should state that the Indian appropriation bill will not be brought up this afternoon, but it will be moved the first thing at the close of the routine business in the morning.

After the conclusion of Mr. NEWLAND's speech,

EMPLOYMENT OF CHILD LABOR.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, by the courtesy of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. Clapr] I trespass upon the time of the Senate for a few moments. I would not do so at this late hour, but the business of the Senate is becoming so congested that we have to take advantage of every opportunity presented.

While the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. Beveridge] was discussing a week ago to-day on this floor the so-called "child-labor bill," he had occasion to very severely condemn the Georgia law for the suppression of child labor, speaking of it as not being worth the paper upon which it was written. I endeavored at that time to have the law inserted, in order that others who might read his denunciation of it might have the opportunity to see whether or not it was a well-merited condemnation or whether the law was, in fact, in its terms calculated to be effective. The Senator, however, would not consent that I should do so at that time. I then stated that I would take opportunity, after he had finished his speech, to insert that law in the RECORD. I have delayed doing so until this time, thinking that the discussion of the subject would be resumed, but it was concluded by him on the next day, which was the 29th of January, and has not since been before the Senate. I do not feel justified, however, in longer withholding the redemption of my promise in that regard. I therefore now present the law of Georgia for insertion in the Record. I will not take the time to read it, unless so required by some Senator.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted to have the law referred to by the Senator printed in the RECORD without reading.

The law referred to is as follows:

The law referred to is as follows:

No. 399.

An act to regulate the employment of children in factories and manufacturing establishments in this State, and to provide for the punishment of violations of the regulations prescribed, and for other purposes. Section I. Be it enacted by the general assembly of Georgia, and it is hereby enacted by authority of the same, that from and after the approval of this act no child under 10 years of age shall be employed or allowed to labor in or about any factory or manufacturing establishment within this State under any circumstances.

Sec. 2. Be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that on and after January 1, 1907, no child under 12 years of age shall be so employed or allowed to labor, unless such child be an orphan and has no other means of support or unless a widowed mother or an aged or disabled father is dependent upon the labor of such child, in which event, before putting such child at such labor, such father shall produce and file in the office of such factory or manufacturing establishment a certificate from the ordinary of the county in which such the facts required to be shown as herein prescribed: Provided, That no ordinary shall issue any such certificate except upon strict proof in writing and under oath clearly showing the necessary facts: And provided further, That no such certificate salle be granted for longer than one year nor accepted by any employer after one year from the date of such certificate.

Sec. 3. Be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that on and after January 1, 1908, no child under 14 years of age shall be employed or allowed to labor in or about any factory or manufacturing establishment within this State between the hours of 7 p. m. and 6 a. m.

Sec. 4. Be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that on and after January 1, 1908, no child, except as heretofore provided, under 14 years of age shall be employed or allowed to labor in or about any factory or manufacturing establishment within this State between

Sec. 7. Be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That any person or agent, or representative of any firm or corporation, who shall violate any provision of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and on conviction shall be punished as prescribed in section 1039 of the Penal Code of Georgia, 1895. Any parent, guardian, or other person standing in parental relation to a child who shall hire or place for employment or labor in or about any factory or manufacturing establishment within this State a child in violation of any provision of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and on conviction thereof shall be punished as prescribed in section 1039 of the Penal Code of Georgia, 1895.

Sec. 8. Be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid. That all laws.

Sec. 8. Be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That all laws and parts of laws in conflict with this act be, and the same are, hereby repealed.

Approved August 1, 1906.

Mr. BACON. I desire to say a very few more words upon the subject. Aside from the terms of a law in the consideration whether or not a law is effective, of course the evidences as to its operation are material. The Senator from Indiana, recognizing that fact, made a statement as to the operation of the Georgia law. On the 29th of January, when he was again addressing the Senate, I endeavored to properly present to the Senate the correction which I deemed necessary of the statement made by him, but the Senator did not give me the opportunity at the time to fully present it. Therefore I am under the necessity of now presenting it in order that it may be clearly set forth.

In the course of the discussion on the 28th of January the Senator, in response to an inquiry by me as to the statement made by him as to the efficiency of the law, made certain rep-resentations as to the efficiency of that law in its practical operation, as disclosed in the following colloquy between the Senator and myself, which I read from the stenographer's notes, the Senator's speech having not yet appeared in the RECORD. This occurred on January 28:

RECORD. This occurred on January 28:

Mr. Bacox. The Senator, in reply to the suggestion as to the efficacy of the Georgia law, made a statement as to the number of children under age in the South who are now employed in the mills. I should like to ask the Senator, as he seems to have exhaustively studied the question, if he is prepared to state how many children in Georgia under 12 years of age or under 14 years of age are to-day employed in the mills?

Mr. Beveridge. I will answer the Senator even more directly than that. I will state that under the new law, which went into effect this very year, there had been applications for the employment of children up to last week in the county clerk's office—I believe it is in Atlanta, or whichever is the greatest city in your State-for 3,000 children, just as there were in Maryland applications since the new law went into effect there for 11,000 children, 1,200 of which were affected, although the census shows there were only 5,000 children of that age at work after the law went into effect on the first of the year, and I shall present it. There have been applications for more than 3,000.

Mr. Bacon. How many of the applications have been granted?

Mr. Beveringe. All were granted.

Mr. Bacon. Has the Senator any evidence that they were all granted?

Mr. Beveringe. Yes, sir.

Subsequent to that, on the same day, the Senator read this from the Atlanta Journal of January 5, 1907:

Despite the fact that the child-labor bill-

Speaking now of the Georgia child-labor bill-became effective in Georgia January 1, it is nevertheless estimated by Ordinary Wilkinson that in Fulton County alone during the current year between 2,000 and 3,000 children under 12 years of age may be put to work in the factories.

On the next morning, which was the 29th of January, before the Senator resumed his argument, I asked him whether he had any other evidence in support of the statement made by him that there had been 3,000 applications filed in that county and that all of them were granted, except the evidence found in the quotation from the Atlanta Journal which I have just read. He replied to me that he had no other evidence. I then sent a telegram to the ordinary of Fulton County, the county in which Atlanta is situated, the ordinary being the official title in that State of the judge of probate, who has charge of such matters. The telegram I sent to him was in these words:

It was asserted yesterday in the Senate that 3,000 applications had been made in Fulton County for exception certificates under the child-labor law and all had been granted. Please telegraph me if the statement is correct, and if not, give number of certificates that have been

A. O. BACON.

Judge Wilkinson sent the following reply:

ATLANTA, GA., January 29, 1907.

Hon. A. O. Bacon, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Assertion in Senate as to application for exception certificates under child-labor law incorrect, as only ten applications have been granted in Fulton County, and the officers of the mills and factories affected by the law are desirous of having it enforced.

JOHN R. WILKINSON, Ordinary, Fulton County.

I also received on the same morning the following telegram from Hon. Madison Bell, who was one of the authors, if he may not be said to be the author, of the Georgia child-labor law, he being a member of the Georgia legislature:

ATLANTA, GA., January 29, 1907.

Senator A. O. BACON, Washington, D. C.:

Beveringe entirely ignorant of provisions and effect of the child-labor law. Grand juries in each county have special authority to in-spect and must see that law is enforced. Ten permits only by Ordinary Wilkinson, of this county. Can prove that thousands of children have been freed from the mills in this State since January 1, 1907. MADISON BELL.

I also received, Mr. President, a telegram to the same effect, which I will not stop now to read, from Mr. Samuel A. Carter, president Gate City Cotton Mills, and a letter from him of the same date on the same subject, which I ask to have printed in the Record without taking the time to read, and also a letter from him addressed to the ordinary of Fulton County and the reply of the ordinary of Fulton County to the same effect as the telegram he sent me.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, permission is granted to print the telegram and letters referred to in the RECORD.

The telegram and letters referred to are as follows:

ATLANTA, GA., January 29, 1907.

Senator A. O. Bacon, Washington, D. C.:

Judge Wilkinson says Senator Beveringe's statement is incorrect; only ten applications been made since January, three of these from cotton mills; letter explains.

Samuel A. Carter, President Gate City Cotton Mills.

GATE CITY COTTON MILLS, Atlanta, Ga., January 29, 1907.

Hon. A. O. Bacon,

Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

Dear Sir: I beg to confirm my telegram to you this p. m., regarding the statement of Judge Wilkinson as to the application being made to him for children to work in the mills of Fulton County. I also beg to call your attention to the inclosed correspondence, which explains itself.

to call your attention to the inclosed correspondence, which explains itself.

And I assert most positively from information received by me from the cotton-mill presidents of Fulton and adjacent counties that the law regarding child labor is being rigidly enforced. There has not been a single application from our mill made to the ordinary.

I have talked with a great number of cotton-mill officials during the past few months, and the information received from them in various sections of the State was that the children that had been working in their mills under 12 years of age had been discarded; and the 1st of January, when the law took effect, there was no hardship upon the mills. The majority of manufacturing plants in Georgia and the South are of modern construction, with all of the comforts and conveniences to be had, and their cottages are new and comfortable, and the operatives, as a mass, are much better off as to churches, schools, and societies, and protection otherwise, than when they lived in the rural and mountainous sections of our State. * *

With highest regards, I beg to remain,

Very truly, yours,

Samuel A. Carter, President.

SAMUEL A. CARTER, President.

GATE CITY COTTON MILLS, Atlanta, Ga., January 29, 1967.

Judge JNO. R. WILKINSON, Ordinary's Office, Atlanta, Ga.

Ordinary's Office, Atlanta, Ga.

Dear Sir: I notice from the Atlanta Constitution this morning a special from Washington, D. C., stating that Senator Beveringe made an assertion in the Senate on yesterday "that since the 1st of January more than 3,000 applications for permission to work children in the mills of Fulton County had been received by you. Will you please let me know officially if this assertion of Senator Beveringe is correct. Also let me know of the applications that have been made how many are from the cotton mills of Fulton County.

Thanking you in advance for a prompt reply, I beg to remain, Very truly, yours, Gate City Cotton Mills.

GATE CITY COTTON MILLS. By SAML. A. CARTER.

ATLANTA, GA., January 29, 1907.

SAMUEL A. CARTER, President.

Dear Sir: In reply to your inquiry in regard to applications for certificates under child-labor law, I beg to say that I have had only ten applications, and of that number only three were for work in the cotton mills, the remainder being for work in the woolen mills, furniture factories, etc.

This covers all times since January 1, 1907, and is up to date and is probably all we will have, as it has been several days since we have had an inquiry.

an inquiry.
Yours, truly,

JOHN R. WILKINSON, Ordinary.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I only bring this up for the purpose of calling attention to the fact that the only foundation for the statement that there were 3,000 applications and that all of the 3,000 applications had been granted was the extract from the Atlanta Journal which I have read, and that the only correction which the Senator from Indiana has made—though he claimed that he had made the correction-is the reading of the particular extract which I have now read.

There was an additional part of the article from the Atlanta Journal which he did read, which will be found, I presume, in his speech when it is published, which in no manner relates to the number of applications which had been made or the number of them which had been granted.

Mr. President, I do not desire to pursue this subject, especially in the absence of the Senator from Indiana, further than to say that I am as much in favor of the suppression of child labor as is the Senator from Indiana. I do not, however, think that it is necessary, in order to suppress it, that conditions in the States should be magnified or that the efforts which are be-ing made and have been made to suppress it should be minified. Nor do I think it is necessary, in order that there should be a suppression of child labor, that there should be any Federal statute on the subject. I believe that the States are fully capa-ble of dealing with this subject and that the States can better deal with it, because the conditions are different in different States and in different latitudes and longitudes.

But so far as the State of Georgia is concerned, I am satisfied that it is the intention of the people of that State to suppress child labor. They have taken what they believe to be an efficient step in that direction in the passage of this law. Whenever it shall be demonstrated that it is not effective, there will be amendments made to it by the State of Georgia which will make it effective. The State is in no manner dependent upon Federal legislation in order to correct what its people believe to be a great evil and which they are determined to suppress.

PENSIONS FOR ENLISTED MEN, SOLDIERS, AND OFFICERS IN CIVIL WAR AND WAR WITH MEXICO.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 976) granting pensions to certain enlisted men, soldiers, and officers who served in the civil war and in the war with Mexico. The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any person who served ninety days or more in the military or naval service of the United Statas Garing the late civil war or sixty days in the war with Mexico, and 5:4 has been honorably discharged therefrom, and who has reached the age of 62 years or over, shall, upon making proof of such facts according to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may provide, be placed upon the pension roll and be entitled to receive a pension as follows: In case such person has reached the age of 62 years, $12 per month; 70 years, $15 per month; 75 years or over, $20 per month; and suca pension shall commence from the date of the filing of the application in the Bureau of Pensions after the passage and approval of this act: Provided, That pensioners who are 62 years of age or over, and who are now receiving pensions under existing laws, or whose claims are pending in the Bureau of Pensions, may, by application to the Commissioner of Pensions in such form as he may prescribe, receive the benefits of this act; and nothing herein contained shall prevent any pensioner or person entitled to a pension from prosecuting his claim and receiving a pension under any other general or special act: Provided, That no person shall receive a pension under any others of this act: provided provided, receive a pension under the provisions of this act: Provided purther. That ho person who is now receiving or shall hereafter receive a greater pension under any other general or special law than he would be entitled to receive under the provisions herein shall be pensionable under this act. Sec. 2. That rank in the service shall not be considered in applications filed hereunder.

Sec. 3. That no pension attorney, claim agent, or other person shall be entitled to receive any compensation for services rendered in pre-

SEC. 3. That no pension attorney, claim agent, or other person shall be entitled to receive any compensation for services rendered in presenting any claim to the Bureau of Pensions, or securing any pension, under this act.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, as I understand, the bill gives a pension simply to the veterans of the Mexican and the civil war?

Mr. SULLOWAY. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Would there be any objection to an amendment embracing the soldiers of the Spanish-American war?

Mr. SULLOWAY. I will say to the gentleman that the two committees sitting as one committee voted unanimously in favor of this bill and directed us to oppose any amendment.

The SPEAKER. Debate is out of order. Is a second demanded?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I demand a second.

Mr. SULLOWAY. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection that a second be considered as ordered?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, I wish to say that there are a few veterans of the Spanish-American war who by age would be entitled to the provisions of this bill, and I can see no reason in fact why the bill should not include them. While, of course, the gentleman can prevent an amendment to the bill, I suggest that it would be a proper amendment to include the veterans of the Spanish-American war who have reached the required age.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman from Kentucky I will say that there are two reasons why the amendment could not be permitted to this bill. The gentleman from New Hampshire and myself were instructed by both committees unanimously, after agreeing to a report on this bill, to oppose any amendment that would be likely to be offered. A still better reason why we ought not to agree to the proposed amendment is that this is a service pension bill, and never in the history of this country has a service pension bill been passed for survivors of any war within thirty-five years of the close of the war. So that the soldiers of the Spanish-American war, gallant though they be, do not deserve any more credit than the gallant heroes of all the other wars of this nation.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from New Hampshire a question.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Very well.
Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Would the gentleman have any objection to an amendment that would include the soldiers who served in the United States Army on the frontier before the civil war and are now drawing pensions?

Mr. SULLOWAY. We have been directed by the two committees, sitting jointly, to oppose any amendment.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. These men are about 70 years of age and performed this service at a time when it was very dangerous. They only draw small pensions, and it was more than fifty years ago that they performed this service. them are drawing no pensions at all; they are scattered all over the western part of this country.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. The merit of any amendment does not enter into this question. There may be thirty or forty meritorious amendments suggested. The fact remains that if one amendment is permitted, some of more merit ought to be at-tached to the bill, which will finally defeat the very object sought for by the bill. Hence it was the unanimous judgment of both committees that no amendment should be permitted to this bill. That ought to be a sufficient answer to anv and every inquiry that Members may see fit to make as to proposed amendments

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?
Mr. SULLOWAY. Yes.
Mr. BURLESON. What amount will this proposed amendment to the pension laws increase the pension appropriation? I understand it grants a service pension to all soldiers of the civil war and increases the service pension heretofore granted soldiers in the war with Mexico.

Mr. SULLOWAY. This will benefit all the soldiers who participated in the war with Mexico. It is estimated that there were about 200,000 of those engaged in the civil war who will be benefited. I think the estimates of the cost that appear in this report are a great deal too large. I have never known the time yet since I have been here when they were not overestimated. In fact, it is estimated there is an unknown army of 100,000 men, whereas General Ainsworth's memorandum shows that there could be but 51,000 if they were all living, and no one knows how many of them are pensioned at this time who would not be eligible this year. I think perhaps $6,000,000 would be an outside estimate.

Mr. BURLESON. Did I understand the gentleman to estimate the increase at $6,000,000?

Mr. SULLOWAY. That is my guess. Mr. BURLESON. I understand it has been generally estimated that it will increase the annual pension appropriation about $15,000,000.

Mr. SULLOWAY. I know such an estimate has been made, but I believe that is double what it will be. That, however, is only my belief.

Mr. BURLESON. I want to ask the gentleman a further question. Was any consideration given the earnest request submitted to the Committee on Pensions to add to this bill an amendment making provision for those soldiers who served on the frontier of Texas between 1855 and 1860? The Government has reimbursed Texas for the expense incurred in maintaining this force, and these soldiers are entitled to pensions.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Not that I am aware of.
Mr. BURLESON. The bill introduced by me is pending before the Committee on Pensions. It makes provision for those soldiers who served on the Texas frontier between 1855 and 1860, and asks that the same provisions of the pension laws heretofore extended soldiers who engaged in Indian wars elsewhere be extended to them. Unquestionably they are entitled to it. There are only a few hundred of them—400 is the outside estimate. Can any gentleman assign a reason why they should not be embraced within the provisions of this bill, treat-ing them as others who have rendered like service have been treated?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, I think I fully answered that question when I answered the inquiry made by the gentleman's colleague, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Ste-His bill shall be given careful consideration.

Mr. BURLESON. I would like to ask the gentleman a further question. Will this amendment bring about a reduction of the force in the Pension Bureau?

Mr. SULLOWAY. I should think not immediately, because these changes with the new applications under this proposed law would perhaps require the entire force for the present. Ultimately that force will be somewhat eliminated. My own view of it is this: This bill provides that on application-it is an age bill in fact, after a certain amount of service—that when a man is adjudicated to 62 years old on a certain day, it is then only a mathematical question to determine when he will be 70 or 75. I personally do not see any particular reason for any large amount of additional service in the Bureau.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?
Mr. SULLOWAY. Yes.
Mr. SPARKMAN. I would like to ask the gentleman from New Hampshire or the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LouDENSLAGER] a question. I understand, of course, the comprehensive objection that has been raised to the incorporation of any amendments to this bill, but I would like to inquire whether the committee, or either one of the committees, considered the propriety of increasing the pensions of the surviving soldiers of the Florida Indian wars of 1856, 1857, and 1858.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, I presume they will receive attention in due time. It was not called to the attention of the committee.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Could the gentleman give us any idea about how long they will have to wait?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. No; I do not think I will go out into the realms of speculation to that degree. I would rather confine myself more to the present earthly conditions.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Right here I would like to say that it has been fifty years since that war closed—the last Seminole Indian war-and if thirty years or even forty years are to be the limit we are beyond that now, and it would be very proper, in this bill, to take care of these old soldiers and the widows of those who are dead.

There is in this Union no more worthy class of people than these old veterans of the Indian wars of this country. It was they who bore the heat and burden of the day, who, ever marching in the van, cleared the forest, drove back the savage, and planted the germs of civilization in every nook and corner of the land. Remote from the protecting arm of the General Government, they cheerfully risked their lives and exposed themselves and their families to the hardships of frontier life that the lot of those who should come after might be more tolerable, and we, to-day, are reaping the benefit of the work they did and the hardships and privations they bore.

Their pensions should be increased along with those of the classes mentioned in this bill, but in view of the understanding between the two committees and the parliamentary conditions under which the bill is brought in here I am aware that no amendment can be made. But I hope that the Committee on Pensions will soon take up and report a bill I have now pending before that committee, or some other similar bill, increasing the pensions of the surviving soldiers of the Seminole Indian wars of Florida at least to $12 per month.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Unless there is something further, Mr. Speaker, I shall ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman reserve his time? Mr. SULLOWAY. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of this bill and have no desire to use the time allotted to me. If anybody is opposed to it, I will be glad to yield the time to which the opposition would be entitled.

Mr. DIXON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, the enactment into law of the provisions of the pending bill will result in placing upon the pension rolls of the Government a large class of worthy and deserving soldiers who are excluded therefrom under existing laws. It will also increase the pensions of many thousands of soldiers who have arrived at the prescribed age, but who, under present laws, receive less than the amount carried in the pending measure. This bill gives to any person who served ninety days or more in the military or naval service of the United States during the civil war, or sixty days in the war with Mexico, and was honorably discharged therefrom and who has reached the prescribed age, a pension ranging from $12 per month to $20 per month, according to his age. Such persons upon arrival at the age of 62 are granted a pension of $12 per month; 70 years, $15 per month, and 75 years, $20 per month. Those who have already reached said ages are entitled to the benefits of the law from the date of their application in the Bureau of Pensions.

The only qualification required, aside from the length of service and honorable discharge, is the required age. The only soldiers who have reached the necessary age excluded from its provisions are those without honorable discharge and those whose services were less than ninety days.

I will gladly support the pending bill as a step in the right direction toward a more generous and liberal policy to the survivors of the civil war, and since the same has the official indorsement of the Grand Army of the Republic, as represented by their committee before the committees of the House, it meets the approval of the soldiers. Personally I would be glad to support a bill that would give to all the survivors of that war larger pensions than provided in this measure. I have received many petitions from Grand Army posts asking for the enactment of a law giving to the surviving soldiers pensions of $30 per month, and I hope to see Congress give consideration to such a bill at an early date.

The Government should now adopt, and should have adopted before this time, a more liberal policy toward those whose services preserved the Union and made possible the great and prosperous nation we now are. The giving of liberal pensions to the veterans is but a slight recognition of the services of these men, for no mere money consideration can pay for the pain and suffering they have borne and the hardships and privations they have endured.

Many of the soldiers fell on the field of battle; thousands dropped by the wayside, worn and weary from the long and forced marches; many died in prison martyrdom, and few if any returned unmarked in health and strength from that four years' struggle, and a generous nation, as a matter of justice, should see that none of these survivors in their old days needs the comforts of life or a proper support.

The people of the country do not begrudge the money necessary for the care, comfort, and support of these veterans, for they remember their services and their ready response to the call of their imperiled country. They remember the heroic patriotism of the volunteer soldier who left the wife and children at home and presented himself to his country to be uniformed for battle and robed for death. It required a high sense of loyalty to government, when surrounded by family and friends and trained to the vocations of peace, to abandon these for an army life of struggle, hardship, and privation. These men at home and later on the field of battle exhibited the highest and loftiest elements of patriotism. Their services and the results are written into the nation's history and are the sacred possession of a happy and united people.

This is the nation's contribution in money to the care and support of the survivors and their families of all wars in which our country has been engaged. But no mere figures or words can measure the deep sense of gratitude to these men. The story of their sufferings, hardships, and privations will forever be cherished in the recollections of a grateful people. They established our independence of the mother country and triumphed over the trained and disciplined soldiery of England; they sustained the right of American citizenship on land and sea; they defeated the army of Mexico and added to our territory the great Southwest and to our wealth untold millions; they cemented the union of States, and rescued Cuba from a thraldom that was both cruel and exacting.

The American soldiers have set a standard that will not soon be attained by the soldiers of any other nation.

While the country and the soldiers have been demanding for years a service pension, the present bill has been the only response, and this does not meet in all respects that demand. Under the rule of the Pension Office, the fact that a soldier is 62 years of age is regarded as evidence that he is disabled one-half in ability to perform manual labor, and under the act of June 27, 1890, would entitled him to a pension of $6 per month. In 1887 the Mexican soldiers who had arrived at the age of 62 years were granted pensions at the rate of $8 per month, and in 1893 the amount was increased to $12 per month, and the pending bill will give them $20 per month, as all are now over the age of 75 years.

The survivors of the Indian wars were in 1892 granted pensions of $8 per month, and the Senate has at the present session of Congress passed a bill to increase this amount to $10 per month. Service-pension laws were enacted for the soldiers of the Revolution thirty-five years after the close of the war; the service-pension law for the survivors of the war of 1812 was enacted fifty-six years after the end of the war, and service pensions for Mexican soldiers were granted thirty-nine years after that war. The soldiers of all the other wars have, as a rule, received earlier consideration than the soldiers of the civil war, yet no war required more heroic service or presented greater hardships.

It has been estimated that on June 30, 1906, there were on the pension roll 148,000 soldiers who receive less than $12 per month and who are between the ages of 62 and 70 years and would be benefited by the pending bill. Of this number, 27,000 were receiving pensions at $6 per month, 66,600 were receiving $8 per month, and 44,000 were receiving $10 per month. The increase of pensions to these soldiers by the provisions of the pending bill amounts to the sum of $6,926,400 annually. At the date mentioned there were 230,000 soldiers pensioned at $12 per month and 21,000 at $14 per month. Of this number, 53,000 were between 70 and 75 years of age and would receive, under this bill, $15 per month, making their total increase $1,788,000. Of the number of soldiers over 75 years of age whose pensions would be increased to $20 per month and who are now receiving less than that sum, it is estimated that 30,000 would be benefited by this bill, and the increase of pensions to these soldiers will be about $2,000,000. There are about 100,000 soldiers whose names are not on the pension roll, and many of these will now be given pensions. The Pension Bureau estimates that $4,000,000 will be required to meet the pensions of this class of soldiers. So the total appropriation for the payment of the new pensions granted and the increases provided for under the bill will amount to a little less than $15,000,000 per annum.

The pension laws of the country are embraced in a large number of separate acts, and were never embodied into a single and comprehensive law covering the entire subject. There are several acts on the same subject, and as a result the administration of these laws has been at times difficult and contradictory, the Pension Bureau at one time construing a statute different from the construction placed upon it by the same Bureau under different officials. The rules and regulations governing the administration of these laws at times caused the soldiers to feel that an injustice was being done them.

Up to 1890 all the general laws concerning pensions for the soldiers of the civil war were based upon physical or mental disability of the claimant. Wounds, injury, or disease must be proven to have been of service origin. Existence of the disability alleged was not sufficient; its cause and origin must be established by proof from the hospital record or by the testimony of witnesses. Physical or mental disability, no matter how great and no matter how intense and continuous the suffering therefrom—these alone were not sufficient. But as time passed proof of disability traced to service origin became more difficult; the comrades were rapidly dying, and those remaining could not frequently remember the facts about which they were called to testify. As a result thousands of worthy cases were rejected upon the grounds of failure to connect the disability with the Army service, and doubt of the origin of these disabilities seemed always to have been resolved against the claimant.

In recognition of this conceded and known difficulty of tracing disabilities to service after the lapse of time, and the additional fact that thousands of soldiers who were suffering from disabilities not of service origin, but which rendered them unable to perform manual labor and earn a living were conceded to be entitled to the nation's bounty and help, and in response to this universal feeling the act of June 27, 1890, was enacted. This law gave to all persons who had served in the military and naval service of the United States during the civil war for ninety days and had been honorably discharged therefrom and were disabled for the performance of manual labor by reason of physical or mental disabilities not the result of their own vicious habits, rendering them unable in greater or less degree to earn a living by manual labor, pensions from $6 to $12. Total disability entitled the soldier to a pension of $12 per month, the maximum amount, and ranged from that sum down to $6, the minimum amount, depending upon the degree of disability established. Under the general law the pension of $30 per month is given for total disability to earn a support by manual labor; under the act of June 27, 1890, the pension of $12 per month is granted for the same disability. In other words, the same disability carries a pension of $30 or $12 per month, depending upon the fact established by proof of whether the disability has been proved to have been of service origin.

In thousands of cases these disabilities are conceded to have arisen since the war, but in many others the seeds of disease, causing these disabilities, were sown during the service, but that fact can not be proven to the satisfaction of the Pension Bureau. As a matter almost of common knowledge, three or four years' service in the field as a soldier, poorly protected from the storms of winter, subjected to untold hardships and deprivations, would naturally affect the health and weaken the physical system in its ability to resist disease. There are many soldiers to-day who by reason of blindness, paralysis, and many other causes are totally helpless and require the attention of an attendant. Thousands of others, wasted by pain, suffering, and disease, are totally unable to earn by manual labor anything. All these men whose disabilities can not be traced to service origin, though they may have enlisted upon the first call for troops and remained in service until the close of the war, yet under existing laws they receive the sum of only $12 per month. It would be hard to identify in these men the strong and gallant youths who charged the heights of Lookout Mountain or passed through the continuous fires of the Wilderness. These men are the ones whose pitiable and helpless condition call, and has called for years, for legislative help, and whose appeals have been and still are in vain.

An increase of the pension under the act of June 27, 1890, to $30 for total disability and a proportionate part thereof for a lesser disease would help those most needing assistance. The pending measure will not lighten the weight of despair nor increase the income of a single veteran included in this class of the totally helpless unless he has reached the age of 70 years, and then it grants an additional pittance of but $3 per month; and if perchance he lives until he reaches the age of 75 he will receive the sum of only $30 per month. Is this a fair measure of justice? Is this the full measure of the nation's gratitude to the men whose services and struggles made the nation what it is? These men gave the vigor and strength of their early manhood to the nation and made it the greatest of the powers of the earth, and now in their helplessness the prosperous nation hesitates to give out of its abundance of riches a sufficient sum to furnish them food, shelter, and support.

On June 30, 1906, there were 205,375 soldiers on the pension rolls under the general law; on the same date on the pension rolls under the act of June 27, 1890, there were 461,078 soldiers, nearly 125 per cent more. It is manifest that an increase of the rates under the law of 1890 would benefit a much larger number of soldiers and it would help those who are unable to assist themselves by manual labor.

This bill does not give a sufficient sum to those now suffering from present disabilities; and while much good to many deserving soldiers will result from its enactment, I can not understand why a more generous and liberal policy should not be pursued at this time. This bill could by amendment be made to infinitely increase its usefulness and greatly multiply its blessings. But we are told that its amendment will imperil its ultimate passage, and hence we support it in its present form, feeling that it is better to get half a loaf than none at all its ultimate passage, and hence we support it in its present form, feeling that it is better to get half a loaf than none at all. The passage of a general law granting to the survivors of the civil war pensions of $30 or at least not less than $24 per month would more surely meet the approval of the soldiers and the people. This would eliminate the passage of special bills by Congress. This special legislation gives to the most deserving class of soldiers merited recognition and assistance, but the number who can be thus helped is so very small when compared with the large number of those who are no less worthy, but whose claims can not be considered, that a general law accomplishing the same purpose would be more equitable. It is a physical impossibility for all these special bills introduced into Congress to be considered by the committee having the duty of their examination, and the House, depending entirely upon such examination and the reports and recommendations thereof, can pass but a limited number of these bills. The present bill will not lessen the demand for this special legislation, since its provisions do not grant sufficient pensions to those who have always been the chief beneficiaries of special bills.

The passage of such a general law as suggested would save large sums of money in the administration of the Pension Bureau in the reduction of the number of examining and special surgeons, clerks, and special agents. For the last fiscal year the total disbursements for pensions was $139,000,288.25. Of this sum the disbursements were:

Medical examinations	$496, 540. 10 499, 787, 95
Rents and contingent expenses, agencies	31, 946, 17
Salaries, Pension Bureau	2, 009, 157, 09
Special examiners, per diem and expenses.	289, 601, 13

Total expenses for Pension Bureau _____ 3, 327, 032. 44

Under such a law the expenses of the Pension Office could be greatly reduced and the money thus saved help to make up the sum required to pay the increased pensions.

There is another meritorious class whose repeated prayers for help are denied. This class is the widows of soldiers, who now receive but $8 per month. Under the act of June 27, 1890, for the widow to receive even this amount she must be without means of support other than her daily labor and an actual net income not exceeding $250. The Pension Bureau in estimating that income take into consideration the rent of the home, if owned by the claimant, and estimate the same as a part of the income. And in the growing towns and cities this item of rent alone equals one-half of the income allowed. In such cases the widow with an income of but $125 and the use of her home is excluded from the bounty of the Government.

If this is a correct interpretation of the intent and wording of the law, the law itself should be changed. The widows should all receive $12 per month, and proof of the husband's death should establish their rights to the same. Under the general law for a widow to receive a pension of $12 per month she must have married the soldier prior to 1886, and his death must be traceable to Army service; otherwise she can receive but $8 per month. The widow's need for a pension is not based upon the cause of her husband's death, nor should its amount be measured thereby. These women, it is true, did not fight on the field of battle, but many of them fought for the very existence of themselves and family while the husband and father was fighting for the existence of the Government.

There were on the pension rolls on June 30, 1906, 175,237 widows who received pensions of $8 per month. And to increase these pensions to $12 per month would require a little more than eight and one-half millions of dollars annually. No one need be startled at such an amount while we hear appropriation bills read for such amounts as to make this sum appear trivial. It is, in fact, a large sum of money, but it must be remembered that the widows depend almost entirely upon their pensions for support. The sum thus required for a year is less than the amount necessary to build and equip a single battle ship. Yet we are asked at this session for an appropriation for the construction of two such ships.

The ship-subsidy bill, which is scheduled to be forced through Congress at this session, will take from the pockets of the people many millions of dollars. This bill will serve as an opening wedge into the Public Treasury and millions will flow into the coffers of certain corporations and the pockets of certain individuals to enhance the profits of private business and special interests. Millions are spent in the Philippines each year, subsidies are given to railroads, and yet to these widows an allowance of $12 per month is denied.

At the beginning of the present fiscal year there were 989,971 names on the pension roll. The decrease during the last year was the largest in the history of the Pension Bureau, 43,300 being dropped on account of death, and from all causes a total of 47,444. Of those now on the rolls, soldiers of the civil war number 666,453 and the widows of the soldiers of said war are 252,047. The average value of the pensions of the civil-war soldiers under the general law is $191.43 and of those under the law of 1890, $114.33. Pennsylvania has the largest number of pensioners of any State; Indiana is the fifth in number, while in the value of pensions Indiana stands fourth. In the average value of her pensions Vermont is first and Indiana second, the values being $165 and $161.39, respectively.

The soldiers were modest in their demands upon the country for help; they appreciated the enormous indebtedness of the nation at the close of the war, and ten years after its close but 5 per cent of the surviving soldiers had applied for pensions. This small per cent included all those who had been wounded, those enfeebled in prison confinement, and those suffering from diseases contracted in the service. And now, forty-two years after the close of that war, in our strength and prosperity we should not neglect our defenders who supported us in our weakness and need. On every battlefield of the war they gave added testimony to the high character and quality of American soldiery. They exhibited the same American spirit that charsoldiery. They exhibited the same American spirit that characterized the achievements of the Revolutionary war. Their bravery and devotion have immortalized the battlefields of the civil war, and their struggles forever settled the question of human slavery and peaceful separation. The settlement was right, and all sections to-day ratify that solution, and the character of the nation at home and abroad is higher by reason of that war. They established beyond question the American doctrine that the volunteer soldiery, taken from the pursuits of industrial life, can be depended upon to defend the country in time of war. The American citizen, trained to peace and the pursuits of industry, leaves his farm, quits his employment, and abandons his books and profession when his country calls. How gladly and profidly he marches forth to battle for his country's cause! From the independence of the farm and from the struggles of the city, of all political opinions and with all religious creeds, the soldiers come, all devoted to a common cause. The hardships of war cheerfully suffered; the brunt of battle gladly borne; defeat in battle but arouses him to more vigorous action; and victory is followed by magnanimity and kindness. His fame will be heard for centuries and the poets' kindness. lyre will forever sing his praises with her choicest notes. The American soldier was the pride of the eighteenth century, the marvel of the nineteenth, and the glory of the twentieth. [Applause.]

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that during five Congresses I have made an effort to secure recognition for those heroic men who defended the frontier of Texas against the aggressions and depredations of the Indians, but up to this time I have utterly failed to impress the committee with the importance of that legislation.

The Government in the last Congress gave official recognition to the services that they rendered, and I hope after the little ray of expectation which is shed upon us by the gentleman from New Jersey, the chairman of the Committee on Pensions, that by the time the next Congress shall have met and adjourned it will do the tardy justice to these people that has been denied for so long a time. A rank discrimination against the Texas Indian fighters is found in our Indian war pension legislation, They are recognized down to the 1st of January, 1856. has been to secure legislative recognition of their valuable services down to the outbreak of the civil war.

Mr. SULLOWAY. The language of the bill is as follows: "That any person who served ninety days or more in the mili-tary or naval service of the United States during the late civil war or sixty days in the war with Mexico" will come within its provisions.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, that explanation is indefinite, and for that reason I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to offer the following amendment.

Mr. SULLOWAY. I think it is very definite, Mr. Speaker, instead of being indefinite, and I object to any amendment.

jects to any amendment?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman by way of debate may read whatever he desires, and the Chair understood the gentleman from New York to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RHODES. I desire to amend this bill by inserting at the conclusion of line 16, page 2, and before section 2, the following amendment:

Provided further, That the provisions of existing pension laws and the provisions of this act be, and are hereby, extended to include the officers and enlisted men, their widows and minor children, of the loyal militia forces of the several States of the Union, by whatsoever name known, that cooperated with the Federal Government in suppressing the late civil war or the war with Mexico, and were honorably discharged therefrom or otherwise honorably relieved from such service.

My reason, Mr. Speaker, for offering this amendment is this: As a matter of fact the people of my-State know, and as a matter of history the people of the United States know, that we have in the State of Missouri a number of loyal Union soldiers who cooperated with the United States Government in suppressing the late war of the rebellion. We know, too, that these soldiers were de facto in the United States service. We know that these soldiers were a part of the great Union Army, and their names are so recorded in the Rebellion Records. I want to say to the distinguished gentleman from New Hamp-shire that the Republican party, his party and mine, has de-clared for just and liberal pensions for the Union soldiers of our country for more than a quarter of a century, and to-day I fear the door of opportunity is about to be closed forever against that class of our deserving loyal soldiers who helped to hold Missouri in the Union and who helped sustain, defend, and uphold the cause of the Union during that awful period of our country's history from 1861 to 1865. I say, Mr. Speaker, it matters not what rulings may have come from the War Department affecting the status of these loyal militia forces; it matters not what opinions may have been rendered by those whose business it is to interpret existing pension laws; it matters not what this House may do; the fact remains the loyal militia soldiers of Missouri were a part of the great Union Army and are entitled to a pensionable status.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS1?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield two or three minutes for a question.

Mr. WEEKS. I simply want to ask a question. ask the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions if the committee will accept an amendment which would enable a veteran of the civil war to accept a medal in place of a pension? I ask this question because I have had two letters from veterans of the civil war since this bill or a similar bill passed the Senate, saying they would prefer a medal rather than a pension.

Mr. SULLOWAY. The Committee on Invalid Pensions has nothing whatever to do with medals. That is a question for the Committee on Military Affairs. If the soldiers want to swap their pensions for medals, maybe they could get an opportunity. We could not accept such an amendment.

Mr. SOUTHARD rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SOUTHARD]?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly. Mr. SOUTHARD. I want to ask a question. I see that this bill provides that no pension attorney, claim agent, or other person shall be entitled to receive any compensation for serv-ices rendered in presenting a claim, and so forth. Now, there is no penalty provided for the violation of the provisions of this act. There will be nothing to prevent an attorney or claim agent from taking a fee in advance, and I think the result will be that a charge will be made for these services, and it will result simply in a different method of collecting the fee. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. Sulloway] if he would accept an amendment embodying something like the language in the act of June, 1890?

Mr. SULLOWAY. No. I say again I object to any amendment. This provision is absolutely harmless, and there is no penalty attached to it. It is as innocent as a babe on its mother's breast. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. ROBERTS rose.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No amendments are in order. I can not yield for the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. ROBERTS. Will the gentleman from New Hampshire

[Mr. SULLOWAY] yield for the purpose of an amendment? Mr. SULLOWAY. No; not for the purpose of an amendment.

We stand pat on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that in the opinion of the Chair two-thirds had voted in favor thereof. Mr. SULLOWAY. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 196, noes 20. So, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed. [Applause.]

Ferrell and Elsie H. Ferrell, his wife, therein, or in an agreement with the Light-House Board or the United States for a conveyance thereof.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded? Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second for the pur pose of getting some information.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I object.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Bab-COCK] objects. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will take their places as tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 91, noes 5.

So a second was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann] is entitled to twenty minutes, and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. Tawney] is entitled to twenty minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, this is the so-called "omnibus light-house bill," carrying authorizations for the construction of various new aids to navigation in the light-house service, some new tenders, some new light-ships, some new light-houses and fog signals, as set forth in the bill. The subcommittee and the full committee have gone over these matters very carefully and rejected all requests except those which seemed imperative. There are one or two other provisions in the bill, one of which abolished the existing light-house at Milwaukee, in the State of Wisconsin, I will say to the gentleman who objected to a second, and another abolishing a light-house in the State of Michigan. In each case the Light-House Board have reported that there was no need for maintaining these light-houses. There are two other light-houses which will be discontinued when the light-houses provided for in this bill are completed.

Another provision authorizes the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to carry out an agreement heretofore made between the Light-House Board and a Mr. Ferrell, by which the Government was to exchange the old Hog Island light-house property in Virginia for a new station. The Government has received the deed for the new station and has located its light upon the new station and asks authority now that the Government may deed, in accordance with this agreement, the old property, which is of itself of very little value.

Mr. TAWNEY. I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois what is the aggregate authorizations carried in this bill?

Mr. MANN. The aggregate amount carried in this bill?

Mr. MANN. The aggregate amount carried in the bill is$1,598,500 for additional light-house service, excepting the matter of light keepers' dwellings. There is authority for the construction of thirty light keepers' dwellings at places where deemed necessary in the opinion of the Light-House Board, but it leaves that matter purely with the Committee on Appropriations to appropriate as they may see fit. There are constant requests for light keepers' dwellings in many places where they are absolutely needed for the benefit of the service. They come to us, and it is not easy for us to differentiate between those which are imperative and those which are not imperatively needed, and we only give authorization for those that are needed, and the Committee on Appropriations under the rule can include a lump sum for this purpose; and if the lump sum be provided it will then be up to the Light-House Board to absolutely determine which is the most meritorious and most needed. We have provided that the limit of cost shall be $6,500 for each station, which would make a total of $195,000. In many places the outside limit would not be required for the light keeper's dwelling.

Mr. TAWNEY. Do I understand this bill to authorize the Light-House Board to enter into contract for the erection of these light-house keeper's dwellings before the appropriation is

Mr. MANN. It does not authorize the Light-House Board to enter into a contract for the erection of light keepers' dwellings before appropriation. We leave that to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. TAWNEY. It fixes the limit of cost at $6,500.

Mr. MANN. At any station.
Mr. TAWNEY. That is the maximum at any station?
Mr. MANN. It is the maximum at any station, except where they have to buy a site, and for that we fix a limit of cost of

Mr. TAWNEY. Does not the gentleman think that rather extravagant cost for a dwelling house for the keeper of a lighthouse?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will understand that the Government does not build a keeper's dwelling house where the gentleman would build a house—on a street or some place where it would be convenient. The keeper's dwelling house is built as a rule where it is not only difficult to obtain a foundation, but very often difficult to bring the material to the place without considerable expense.

Mr. TAWNEY. These cases are comparatively few as compared with the instances where the light-house keepers' dwellings are erected where it is easy to get a foundation and material, and also where good foundations are obtained without much cost.

Mr. MANN. I have been through the authorizations which have been made both by our committee and the gentleman's committee for a number of years, and they run from $5,000 to $6,500. The light keeper's dwelling ordinarily is built at some point where it is necessary, and to get to the light-house it must be within an easy distance.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman allow me another ques-on? Are these dwellings single dwellings or double dwellings-that is, are they for one family or more than one family?

Mr. MANN. We provide that they can not expend more than place. In most places they have two or $6,500 at any one three families, and they must have two or three small dwellings, but the limit of cost is $6,500 which they can expend at any station.

Mr. TAWNEY. Can the gentleman state what the total authorization was in the omnibus light-house bill that passed at the last session of Congress?

Mr. MANN. At the last session we passed a bill carrying about $1,300,000. The Senate increased it to about $2,400,000, and as it became a law it was about $1,900,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. And this is $1,2 Mr. MANN. This is $1,598,500. And this is $1,200,000?

Mr. OTJEN. I notice that you provide that the North Point light, at Milwaukee, is to be abandoned. Will you please explain the reason for that?

Mr. MANN. The North Point light, at Milwaukee, is situated at a point now where a vessel that sees the light sees right over the light into the city of Milwaukee and can not distinguish the light from the city lights in Milwaukee. The light, therefore, is absolutely not only useless, but worse than useless. The Light-House Board have recommended its discontinuance for a number of years, but through various reasons it has not been discontinued, and we thought it was a proper thing to discontinue it in this bill.

Mr. OTJEN. You are aware that a few years ago there was an effort to abandon this light, and there was a good deal of opposition by commerce at that time.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon. I think there was no opposition on the part of commerce. There was considerable political opposition.

Mr. OTJEN. Don't you think it would be better that this light be maintained until we can get the new light-house built?

Mr. MANN. The sooner it is abolished the better it is for commerce. It is a danger now. It is just as bad as a shoal. The vessel, when it comes down and makes for that light, can not tell whether it is seeing the light in the light-house or whether it is seeing the lights in the city of Milwaukee. It is often not possible to distinguish those lights.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

I yield to the gentleman from Missouri. Mr. MANN.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois which committee has reported this bill?

Mr. MANN. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Does not the gentleman think that since the bill contemplates the erection of public buildings the committee of the House which has charge of those matters should really have charge of this bill?

Mr. MANN. I would if the rules of the House did not provide that all matters relating to the light-house service should go to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Oh, Mr. Speaker-

Mr. MANN. Now, the gentleman might contend that a light-house was a public building, and yet under the rules of the House and the practice of the House for a century's time these bills have gone to the Committee on Commerce, now the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois that I do not propose to raise the question of jurisdiction at all. I am not opposed to the bill; but I want to say that in the future whenever the erection of a public building is contemplated, no matter what service it may be intended for, the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds will insist on the bill being referred to that committee.

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman that he present his insistence to the Speaker and the Committee on Rules and get them to change the rule, because the present rule confers the jurisdiction upon the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Com-

Mr. BARTHOLDT. If the gentleman will permit, as far as the Light-House Service is concerned, that is a service of which your committee has charge; but when it comes to the erection of public buildings for light-house keepers, it seems to me that is a matter that ought to come before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is mistaken in reference to the des. Clause 7 of Rule XI provides for the reference to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of subjects-

Relating to commerce, the Life-Saving Service and light-houses, other than appropriations for the Life-Saving Service and light-houses.

Those subjects go to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. So that, under the rules, any question relating to light-houses is properly referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. But that does not include the dwelling for the light-house keeper.

Mr. MANN. The dwelling is a part of the light-house station. Where we authorize the construction of a light-house they erect a dwelling if it is needed.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Is that the case in every instance? Mr. MANN. That is the case in every instance. Mr. KEIFER. Not always, but nearly always.

Mr. KEIFER. Not always, but nearly always.

Mr. MANN. It is always the case as far as the authorization is concerned. I do not mean to say they erect a dwelling every time we authorize a light-house. But under the authority to erect a light-house they can erect a dwelling if it is an essential part of the service. I may say to the gentleman from Missouri that we would be very glad indeed to turn over to the gentle-man's committee the subject of light keepers' dwellings, as we are now turning it over to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I want to say on this subject that the Committee on Appropriations has encroached on the rights and privileges of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to this extent-

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will fight that out with the Committee on Appropriations sometime when we have more

Mr. BARTHOLDT. The gentleman has plenty of time; there is no opposition to his bill. The Committee on Appropriations has encroached on the jurisdiction of the Committee on Public Buildings to the extent that nearly every public building now being erected in the city of Washington is being erected under the jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations instead of under the jurisdiction of the Committee on Public Buildings, which was created for that purpose.

Mr. MANN. I will now yield to the gentleman from Illinois

[Mr. GRAFF].

Mr. GRAFF. I want to ask the gentleman if there are any provisions in the bill authorizing buoy tenders?

Mr. MANN. There is a provision authorizing a buoy tender in the upper Mississippi River—that is, for the fifteenth light-house district, which embraces the upper Mississippi Valley—and it is an absolute necessity for the protection of the wing dams in the Mississippi River.

Mr. TAWNEY. Before the gentleman from Illinois takes his seat I would like to have him give the House some information as to the total amount carried in this bill and in the omnibus light-house bill passed at the last session. As I figure it up, it amounts to $3,500,000—that is, the amount authorized by the bill which became a law at the last session and the amount authorized by this proposed bill make the total authorization for this Congress $3,500,000.

Mr. MANN. It would be in that neighborhood.

Mr. TAWNEY. Does the gentleman consider, or has his committee considered, how much of this authorization will be required or how much of this work can be done in the next fiscal year by the Light-House Board?

Mr. MANN. I think the most of the money could be profitably expended during the next year. The Government is now building five light-house vessels under contract in New York. It is building them at a cost of a little less than $100,000 per vessel, whereas if they were building them singly the cost would be quite, if not more than, $125,000 a vessel. We hope that the light-house vessels carried in this bill may be built as cheaply as those and possibly by the same firm, after bids, of course, on the same plans. We expect also that possibly the large tenders provided for in this bili will follow the same plan and be built at the same time as the tenders authorized last year, which were held up because the authorization then was not large enough. The expectation is that these will be built all together, so that any firm who builds them will be able to duplicate the work as it goes along, and therefore do it more

The question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the bill was passed.

FOUR ADDITIONAL REVENUE CUTTERS.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill S. 925, an act authorizing the construction of four steam vessels for the Revenue-Cutter Service of the United States, with the House amendments.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the construction, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, of four steam vessels for the Revenue-Cutter Service, is hereby authorized, at a total cost not to exceed $650,000, said vessels to be as follows:

One steam revenue cutter of the first class for duty in Puget Sound and adjacent waters, at a cost not to exceed $225,000.

One steam revenue cutter of the first class for duty at Savannah, Ga., and adjacent waters on the Atlantic coast, at a cost not to exceed $200,000.

One able seeming that for the Beneral Cutter Coast.

One able seagoing tug for the Revenue-Cutter Service for duty at New Bedford, Mass., and adjacent waters on the Atlantic coast, at a cost not to exceed $175,000.

One boarding vessel for the Revenue-Cutter Service for duty at New Orleans, La., and adjacent waters, at a cost not to exceed $50,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second. Mr. CUSHMAN. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there

There was no objection.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Speaker, this bill might properly be called an "omnibus revenue-cutter bill." It provides for the construction of four new vessels for the Revenue-Cutter Service, one to be located at Puget Sound, one to be located at Savannah, Ga., one to be located near New Bedford, Mass., and the fourth located at New Orleans. The aggregate amount carried in this bill for these four vessels is $650,000. The bill has been favorably reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and has the recommendation of the Treasury Department and the Chief of the Revenue-Cutter Service.

I may say that in reporting this bill the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee have had a large number of bills before it providing for additional revenue cutters. The committee did not feel that it could favorably report all of those bills, so we selected the four vessels that the Chief of the Revenue-Cutter Service thought the most imperatively needed, and those are the four vessels included in this bill, at an aggregate cost of $650,000. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit a question?
Mr. CUSHMAN. Certainly.
Mr. TAWNEY. What is the aggregate cost of these four vessels:

Mr. CUSHMAN. Six hundred and fifty thousand dollars for four vessels. There is one revenue cutter provided for, to be stationed at Puget Sound, Washington, at a cost of $225,000; one revenue cotter, to be stationed at Savannah, Ga., at a cost of $200,000; one ocean-going tug for the Revenue-Cutter Service, to be stationed near New Bedford, Mass., at a cost of $175,000, and the last one, a boarding vessel, to be stationed at New Orleans, La., at a cost of $50,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. Was there any demand for the Revenue-

Cutter Service in the district of any of the other members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Oh, yes; there was.

Mr. TAWNEY. And they were rejected? Mr. CUSHMAN. They were not rejected. I will say to the gentleman from Minnesota-

Mr. Speaker, there is no member of the commit-Mr. MANN. tee from New York, and no member of the committee from Massachusetts.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. There is no revenue cutter provided for New York in this bill.

Mr. MANN. This ocean-going tug is for Massachusetts.

Mr. WALDO. How about Illinois?

Mr. MANN. There is no revenue cutter provided for Illinois, nor was there an item in the light-house bill for Illinois.

Mr. CUSHMAN. I will say to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. Tawney], who is one of the watch dogs of the Treasury, that the members of that committee have found themselves unable to favorably report every bill introduced for a new revenuecutter vessel because of the enormous expense that would entail, and in that situation we sent for the Chief of the Revenue-Cutter Service and said to him that we could not appropriate as much money for revenue-cutter bills as that department wanted, but we asked him to specify and designate those vessels which were the most imperatively needed by his department, and these four vessels were selected as being the four vessels most urgently needed by that department. We therefore amended the Senate bill (which only provided for one revenue cutter as it passed the Senate) and included the four vessels now designated in this bill at a total cost of $650,000. That was a move in the interest of economy and certainly ought to be sanctioned by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY].

I shall read briefly from the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1906 (pp. 34 and 35), that portion of his report wherein he specifically recommends the passage of this identical bill in exactly its present form:

I strongly recommend the passage of Senate bill 925, which has been amended and reported favorably to the House by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. This bill provides for the construction of a first-class cutter for Puget Sound, a first-class cutter for Savannah, Ga., and adjacent waters on the Atlantic coast, an able seagoing tug for New Bedford, Mass., and the waters of Vineyard and Nantucket sounds, and a boarding vessel for duty at New Orleans, I.a. These vessels are urgently needed to improve the efficiency of the service at the points named. It has been found necessary to discontinue the services of the Grant on Puget Sound (where she has been stationed for many years) owing to her present deteriorated and unseaworthy condition and to the fact that she is not worth further repairs. This will leave Puget Sound, with its extensive maritime interests, and the dangerous outlying waters of the coast of Washington, without a regular cruising cutter. The pressing need of a new vessel to take the place of the Grant is apparent.

Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill as amended.

The question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

FLUCTUATIONS IN PRICE OF COTTON.

Mr. LOVERING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House resolution No. 795, which I send to the desk and ask to have read, and I ask unanimous consent that the amendment, in the form of a substitute, be read instead of the original resolution.
